given by such a certificate. However, evidence by certificate is merely one option. The conditions of admissibility may be proved by oral evidence from a person familiar with the operation of the computer who can give evidence of its reliability and such a person need not be a computer expert or someone qualified to sign a certificate.[85] The Court is not entitled to rely on the maxim omnia praesumuntur rite esse acta.[86] The conditions of admissibility must be proved beyond reasonable doubt if the document is tendered by the prosecution,[87] but on the balance of probabilities if tendered by the defence. If the conditions of admissibility are in dispute, a trial within a trial may be required.[88]

In estimating the weight, if any, to be attached to a statement "regard shall be had (a) to whether it provides information that was supplied contemporaneously to the computer, or recorded contemporaneously for the purpose of being so supplied; and (b) to whether anyone concerned with the supply of the information or the operation of the computer had an incentive to conceal or misrepresent the facts."[89]

Rules as to notice to produce.

S. 66. Secondary evidence of the contents of the documents referred to in Section 65, clause (a), shall not be given unless the party proposing to give such secondary evidence has previously given to the party in whose possession or power the document is, or to his attorney or pleader, such notice to produce it as is prescribed by law; and if no notice is prescribed by law, then such notice as the Court considers reasonable under the circumstances of the case:

Provided* that such notice shall not be required in order to render secondary evidence admissible in any of the following cases, or in any other case in which the Court thinks fit to dispense with it:—

(1) when the document to be proved is itself a notice;

(2) when, from the nature of the case, the adverse party must know that he will be required to produce it;

(3) when it appears or is proved that the adverse party has obtained possession of the original by fraud or force;

(4) when the adverse party or his agent has the original in Court;

(5) when the adverse party or his agent has admitted the loss of the document;

(6) when the person in possession of the document is out of reach of, or not subject to, the process of the Court.

COMMENTS

1. GENERAL PRINCIPLE

This section lays down that a notice must be given before secondary evidence can be received under Section 65(a). Notice to produce a document must be in writing. Order XI, Rule 15, of the Civil Procedure Code, prescribes the kind of notice to produce a document.

Notice under this section has to be given to the party in whose possession or power the document is. The word 'party' means not only the adversary but also a stranger 'legally bound to produce' the document.

The procedure for the production of documents in criminal cases is laid down in Sections 93-96 of the Criminal Procedure Code.

While Section 65(a) refers to secondary evidence of the existence, condition or contents of a document this section refers only to 'contents' and not the existence or condition of the document.

The object of this rule is to give the party an opportunity to enable him to produce the document and thus to secure the best evidence of its contents.[90]

In order that secondary evidence of documents mentioned in Section 65(a) may be given, it is essential that the procedure laid down in Section 66 should be strictly complied with. When no notice, as required by Section 66, has been given, secondary evidence is not admissible.[91]

Before secondary evidence of the existence, condition or contents of a document is admitted, it must be proved that the document is in the possession of the person against whom it is sought to be proved and that, though such person was issued with notice, he had failed to produce it.[92]

Where a party sought to prove, by production of the registers of the sub-registrar's office, not by any original entry prepared by the sub-registrar himself but copies of the document, the originals of which were in the custody of the persons in whose favour they were executed, it was held that such documents cannot be admitted in evidence by simply producing the registers of the Registration Office without calling for the original documents from the persons concerned.[93]

Where an original unregistered sale deed is in the possession of the plaintiff and is available, no secondary evidence can be admitted unless notice under Section 66 to.

Where an objection is taken for adducing secondary evidence, on the ground of non-service of notice, the trial court has to consider whether a notice should be given or be dispensed with; if the objection is not raised in the trial court, it should not be permitted to be raised in the Appellate Court.[94]

Where the insurer did not give notice to the owner to produce the original policy of insurance, and also did not take any step contemplated under the Civil Procedure Code for its production, and the insurer then tendered the copy of the insurance policy at a late stage of the proceedings, it was held that it was not admissible.[95]

2. NOTICE PRESCRIBED BY LAW

Where a Pardanashin woman is living with her brother, service of notice on the brother constitutes notice as required by this section.[96] In the case of Pardanashin Ladies, normally their husbands would appear to produce the documents summoned from their wives as they would naturally be in possession of the documents. So, they can also prove the documents which were executed in favour of their wives, even if the wives are not benamidars of the husbands. So service of notice on them cannot be a ground to reject the husband's evidence to prove the documents.[1]

Issuing of notice to produce some documents not referred to in the opposite party's affidavit of documents as being in his possession, was held not a good notice.[2]

Section 175 of the Indian Penal Code punishes the person who omits to produce a document required by a public servant.

3. WHEN NOTICE SHALL NOT BE REQUIRED [PROVISOS]

The proviso enumerates the following six cases in which a notice is not required to be given to the party in whose possession or power the document is, in order to render secondary evidence admissible.

(a) When Notice itself is to be proved [Proviso (1)]

Notice shall not be required to be given (under this section) when the document to be proved is itself a notice. When a party sends a notice to the opposite party and it is received by him, a copy of the notice is admissible, and it is not obligatory to issue notice calling upon the opposite party to produce the original notice.

PHIPSON on Evidence (15th Edn. (2000), para 41-31, page 1120) observes: "Notice to produce the original is not necessary:

(b) When the document to be proved is itself a notice which has been served on the adversary; though not on a third, e.g. a notice to produce or to quit, or of action, or of the dishonour of a bill, when the action is brought upon the bill, or of intention to remove a building, pursuant to a by-law under the Public Health Act, 1875 (now the Highways Act, 1980)".[3]

In a suit against the Union of India, a copy of the notice under Section 80, CPC, was sought to be produced by the plaintiff, but it was objected to on behalf of the defendant on the ground that a copy was not admissible. It was held that Section 65, read with Section 66 of the Evidence Act, permits the plaintiff to produce the copy of the notice without summoning the original; it was for the defendant to show, by production of the original, that the document did not amount to a notice according to Section 80, CPC. Where the defendant failed to produce the original, he could not have any grievance when its copy was produced by the plaintiff.[4]

(b) The adverse party must know that he will be required to produce it [Proviso (2)]

According to this, when, from the nature of the case, the adverse party must know that he will be required to produce a document, notice shall not be required for tendering secondary evidence.

When it is clear that the original is in the possession or control of the party taking an objection to the admissibility of secondary evidence, and he has failed to produce it, sub. Cl. (2) of Proviso to Section 66 applies, as the adverse party knows that he would be required to produce it. When he fails to produce it, secondary evidence is admissible, without giving notice.[5]

However, it was held that Sections 65 and Section 66 must be read together, and the court ought not to hold that the adverse party must have known that he would be required to produce it so as to dispense with the necessity of a notice to produce, unless the original is shown or appears to be in the possession of the person against whom the presumption is drawn.[6] In a suit for declaration that the subject matter of the suit is trust property, plaintiff stated that he had seen the original deed of the trust in the possession of the defendant; and then produced a certified copy of the trust deed. It was held that the defendant must have known that he would be required to produce the document, that proviso (2) to Section 66 was satisfied and so the production of the certified copy was sufficient proof of the deed itself.[7] Where the plaintiff stated that the original deed relating to the suit house, was with the defendant who did not deny the statement, it was held that it would be a proper case to dispense with the notice, and the certified copy was admissible.[8] Where a defendant denied any knowledge of the execution of Wakfnama by her late husband, but said in her evidence that she might be in possession of the document, but she was not sure of it, it was held that notice was not necessary as there was implied knowledge of the existence of the document and that she was required to produce it.[9] Where a driver and conductor were prosecuted under the Motor Vehicles Act for committing breach of the conditions of the registration certificate, it was held that they must be deemed to have known that they would be required to produce the certificate and the permit; and that if they failed to produce them, the prosecution was entitled to produce secondary evidence.[10] In a suit for redemption of mortgaged property, the defendants who are in possession of the mortgage deed must have known that they would be required to produce it in the suit; accordingly, secondary evidence, without noticed to them for its production, was held admissible.[11] Where the plaintiff mentioned in the plaint itself about a certain document and the defendants denied its existence, it was held notice was not necessary and copy of that document was admissible.[12]

Where the defendant deposed that the original deed of a family settlement was not with the plaintiff, but was with a third party who was dead, it was held that, to admit secondary evidence, no notice to the plaintiff was required.[13]

Sometimes, from the pleadings, implied notice to the adverse party showing that he will be required to produce the document can be gathered.

(c) Adverse party obtaining possession of original by fraud or force [Proviso (3)]

Where the application, alleging force or fraud committed by the opposite party, to obtain the possession of the original document, was neither pleaded in the plaint nor proved, the plaintiff was not entitled to exemption from giving him notice.[14]

(d) Person in possession out of reach or out of jurisdiction of Court [Proviso (6)]

In Haranand v. Ramgopal,[15] it was held that secondary evidence may be given of the judicial proceedings of a foreign State without notice to the adverse party, when the person in possession of the document is out of reach of or is not subject to the process of the court. The provision as to notice under Section 65 is qualified by Cl. (6) of Section 65, which dispenses with notice when the person in possession of the document is out of reach and not subject to the process of the court.[16] Secondary evidence of the contents of the document was held admissible when the defendant was out of the jurisdiction of the court, and did not comply with the summons to produce the document and when the service of notice upon his pleader at the last moment would have been nugatory.[17]

It must be shown to the court, to its satisfaction, that the person who is in possession of the document is out of reach and is not subject to the process of the court. It was held that, when the original award was in possession of the person who was not subject to the process of the court, a copy of the original was admissible.[18]

4. ANY OTHER CASE THE COURT THINKS FIT TO DISPENSE WITH NOTICE

Apart from the provisions of clauses 1 to 6 of Section 66, there is also a general provision in the proviso stating that in any other case notice can be dispensed with, when the court thinks fit. In Surendra Krishna v. Mirja Md. Syed Ali,[19] it was held that court has absolute power under Section 66 to dispense with notice when it thinks fit.[20]

Notice to produce the document can be dispensed with where the defendant denies the existence of the document itself. When, in the previous litigation, it was held that the document in question was in the possession of the plaintiff's father, it was held that there was no reason to suppose it was in the possession of the defendant, in the present suit; thus a notice to produce was a mere formality.[21]

A technical defect in the service of notice can be condoned, in the absence of any prejudice to any of the accused persons, resulting in clear mis-carriage of justice.[22]

The Calcutta High Court has held that oral evidence of the contents of a letter which had neither been called for, nor produced, was inadmissible under this section, though no objection was taken to the giving of that evidence, and that no subsequent order dispensing with notice could operate to make it admissible. There is no law in this country that the absence of objection to the evidence which is legally admissible makes it admissible.[23]

However, where the copies of registered documents, without issue of notice to the opposite party, were admitted and marked as exhibits in the case, without any objection being raised, it was held that it was not open to the party against whom they were admitted, to raise any objection that proper procedure had not been followed or proper foundation was not laid for admission of such secondary evidence.[24]

COMMENTS

1. PRINCIPLE

Besides the question which arises as to the contents of a document (see Ss. 61-66), there is always the question when the document is used in evidence;—Is it what it purports to be? The evidence upon this point is dealt with in Ss. 67-73. The nature of the evidence will depend to a large extent on the nature of the document. If it is a mere memorandum, such as an entry in a diary mentioned in S. 32(b), it must be proved that the diary was really that of the person whose statements it is said to contain. If it is a letter, it must be shown who wrote it, or at any rate who signed it, for a signature to a document turns the whole document into a statement by the person who signs it. If it is an agreement it must be shown who executed it.[25]

In Venkatachala v. Thimmajamma,[26] it was observed at p. 517: Under Section 67, if a document is alleged to be signed be any person, the signature of the said person must be proved to be in his handwriting and, for proving such a handwriting under Sections 45 and 47 of the Act, the opinions of experts and of persons acquainted with the handwriting of the person concerned are made relevant. Section 68 deals with the proof of the execution of the document required by law to be attested; and it provides that such a document shall not be used as evidence until one attesting witness at least has been called for the purpose of proving its execution. These provisions prescribe the requirements and the nature of proof which must be satisfied by the party who relies on a document in a Court of law".

The normal methods of proof of signatures and handwriting are:—

(1) By calling the person who signed or wrote the document.

(2) By calling the person in whose presence the document was signed and written.

(3) By calling an expert.

(4) By calling the person who is acquainted with the handwriting of the persons by whom the document was purported to be signed or written.

(5) By the admission of the person who was alleged to have signed or written.

(6) By comparison, of the signature on the document with the admitted or proved signature of the person who purported to have signed or written the document.

(7) By other circumstantial evidence.[27]

The definition of the word "proved" in Section 3 must be read along with this section. According to Section 3 there must be specific evidence that the signature purporting to be that of the executant, is in the handwriting of the executant; until that is proved, the court cannot consider whether execution is proved. In other words, Section 67 makes proof of execution of a document something different from mere proof of the matter.[28]

2. PROOF OF HANDWRITING IN PROOF OF EXECUTION

Where merely the signature of a person on a typewritten document was identified by a witness, it was held that what was formally proved was the signature and not the body of the document.[29]

Appellate court is entitled to weigh the evidence, to give a finding on the execution of a document by a particular person.[30]

A Sub-Divisional Officer stated that a complaint was handed over and it did not bear any signature, but two persons came and gave it to him. One of them deposed that there were two other persons of the same name as his. It was held that the statement of the Sub-Divisional Officer only proved that the writer of it handed over the complaint, that neither the contents of the complaint were proved nor the maker of the complaint proved it and hence the complaint was not proved.[31]

A party seeking to prove the execution of a document is not required to prove that the executant knew the contents thereof, when the executant denies having signed it and pleads it as forgery. But, if the executant pleads ignorance, then in certain circumstances it may be necessary to satisfy the court that the executant had knowledge of the contents.[32]

It was held that, in order to prove the writing of a person, it is not necessary that the person must know the language in which the document has been written; if he has deposed that the execution has been made in his presence and he had seen the executant putting his signature in his presence, the document stands proved; on the same reasoning, even if a person is an illeterate but he has seen somebody putting his signature on the document in his presence, he must be said to have proved the document.[33]

An illiterate person not being able to identify a document on which he has seen someone writing, cannot ordinarily prove a writing or signature made, but another person knowing the language in which the document was written can identify the document with certainty and he can prove the writing.[34]

Where a pronote was written in Hindi and signed by the executant, and the witnesses testified to its signing by the executants in their presence, execution of the document was held proved.[35]

In divorce cases, marriage certificates and other correspondence must be proved as required under Section 67.[36]

Where the plaintiff stated that he obtained the horoscope in question from his father, but did not state the name of the astrologer and whether he was familiar with the writings of the said astrologer, it was held that the document could not be admitted in evidence for proving the date of birth.[37] Where a suit was filed for refund of price paid under a sale deed and also for damages, alleging breach of warranty of title, and the vendor was not examined, it was held that the sale deed could not be said to have been proved.[38] The sanction for prosecution cannot be termed as proved unless proved as per Ss. 47 and 67. Mere statement that the sanction was given by the authorised person without any evidence as to acquaintance with the signature and contents thereof, the document as such could not be said to be proved.[39] Where an agreement of sale, bearing the vendors' signatures on the first two sheets, was found to be validly executed, it was held that no inference could be drawn that the agreement was proved, when the third sheet did not bear their signatures.[40]

This section does not prescribe any particular mode of proof. So, in addition to the modes of proof of handwriting, it may also be proved by circumstantial evidence, the only requirement being that the proof should be given to the satisfaction of the court, either by direct or by circumstantial evidence.[41] Section 67 does not lay down any specific mode of proof and therefore circumstantial evidence as a mode of proof of authorship or execution of documents is not excluded. Such evidence may consist of internal evidence contained in the document itself. Oral evidence of witnesses can prove other surrounding circumstances.[42] The execution or authorship of a document is a question of fact and may be proved like any other fact, by direct as well as circumstantial evidence, although the circumstantial evidence must be of sufficient strength to carry conviction. Circumstantial evidence may be (1) Internal evidence contained in the document; (2) oral evidence of witnesses to prove other circumstances.[43]

When both parties admitted the transactions in certain consignment notes, it was held that, though those documents were not proved according to Section 67, the doctrine of authentication by contents would come into play, and the notes were proved by internal evidence afforded by their contents which were found to be correct on evidence aliunde.[44]

The section deals with proof of the signature of the person who is alleged to have executed the document. It does not deal with the signatures of attestors in whose presence the document is signed.[45]

3. EXECUTION OF DOCUMENT—MEANING

Execution means signing, sealing and delivery of a document. The term may be defined as a formal completion of a deed. It is the last act or series of acts which completes it.[46]

Execution of a document is something different from mere signing of the document. The term execution is not defined. JUSTICE RANKIN observed: "The ordinary meaning of 'executant' is fairly clear....the ordinary meaning of executing a document is signing a document as a consenting party thereto..... The man whose name has been put to the document as evidencing his assent thereto is the executant for the purpose of the section (Section 35 Registration Act)... In the case of Bakalam (by the pen) Signature, such as we have here, a person whose name is put with his authority in evidence of his assent to a document, is 'executant' within the meaning of Section 35".[47] While this decision was affirmed by the Privy Council it was observed: "A document is executed when those who take benefits and obligations under it have put or caused to put their names to it. Personal signature is not required."[48]

"Execution" means something more than mere signing. It includes delivery and signing in the presence of witnesses where they are necessary.[49]

Execution of the document means that the executant must have signed or put his thumb mark impression, only after the contents of the document have been fully stated and read by the executant before he put his signature thereon. Mere admission of the initial by the executant would not be tantamount to an admission of execution of the document.[50] Execution is, when applied to a document, the last act or series of acts, which complete it. It might be defined as formal completion. Thus, execution of deeds is the signing, sealing and delivering of them in the presence of the witnesses. Execution of a will includes attestation. 'Execution' does not mean merely signing. It should be accompanied by the intention to give effect and operation to the instrument signed.[51]

In the case of a thumb impression by an illeterate person, the burden is on the person relying on the document to prove that the document was read and explained.[52]

Where a document purports to have been executed by a paradanashin or illiterate woman, the parties relying upon it must not only formally prove the document but must, in addition, prove that the contents were read over and explained to the executant.[53]

Putting of thumb impression by a person who knows how to sign his name, does not invalidate the document.[54]

This section requires proof of signature and handwriting of the person who is alleged to have signed or written the document produced.[55] Mere admission of execution of a document is not sufficient. Proof that the signature of the executant is in his handwriting is necessary.[56]

The Evidence Act permits secondary evidence to be given with regard to the attestation of an attesting witness who is either dead or cannot be brought to Court. The signature of the attesting witness when proved in evidence is proof of everything on the face of the document and that he saw the executant make his mark.[57] A certified copy of a sale-deed is admissible in evidence but where the vender is denying its execution, it should be proved as required under this section. Mere production of the certified copy will not be sufficient.[58]

A deed of conveyance was tendered in evidence; it purported to bear the mark of G, as vendor, and was duly attested by four witnesses, G, however, denied that she had executed the deed, and said that the mark was not hers. All the attesting witnesses were dead. A witness who knew the handwriting of one of the attesting witnesses, was called; he swore that the signature of that witness to the attestation clause of the deed was genuine. It was held that the deed was admissible in evidence, its execution by G being sufficiently proved.[59]

4. PROOF OF CONTENTS

It was held that, unless the writer of the document himself is examined, evidence of contents of the documents is hearsay. Any attempt to prove contents by proving signature or handwriting of the author thereof is not permissible.[60]

The consent given by a party for making a document does not dispense with either the proof of the contents of the document or the truth or otherwise of the contents.[61]

5. OBJECTION TO MODE OF PROOF

Objection to mode of proof of a document must be taken at the time when it is exhibited.[62]

6. REGISTRATION AND PROOF

Mere registration of a document is not in itself sufficient proof of its execution.[63]

The mere production of a registered deed is not sufficient to prove it. The identity of the executant has to be established by oral evidence before the deed can be taken to have been proved.[64]

In regard to will, it was held that the presumption in favour of due execution of the will, could be raised if the signatures of testator and attestors are proved. If attestors are not available, registration of will does not ipso facto constitute proof of valid execution.[65]

7. REGISTRATION CERTIFICATE—VALUE [SECTION 60(2)]

In Gopal Das v. Shri Thakurji,[66] it was held that the evidence of due registration was itself some evidence of execution, against the party so making the admission. In that case, at the time of registration, the executant was identified by two persons one of whom was known to the registrar and who was also the scribe of the document. Dealing with that, the Privy Council observed; "What remains to be shown is that the person admitting execution before the registrar was this Parshotam Das and no impostor. The question is one of fact except insofar as there was as a matter of law a presumption that the registration proceedings were regular and honestly carried out. It seems clear that any objection to the sufficiency of the proof upon this point would have been idle, the circumstances being such in the evidence of the due registration is itself some evidence of execution as against the plaintiff. Wills and documents which are required by law to be attested, raise other questions but this receipt was not in that clause.[67]

Registration is a solemn act to be performed in the presence of a competent official appointed to act as Registrar. All things done before him in his official capacity and verified by his signature will be presumed to be done duly and in order.[68] Certificate of registration is prima facie proof of execution, in the absence of other evidence.[69] Where the execution of a registered document was denied, it was held that the endorsement of a registering officer was sufficient to dispense with proof as required by Section 67.[70]

It is to be noted that documents which are required by law to be attested must be distinguished from documents which are not so required to be attested. The Privy Council case Gopal Das v. Shri Thakurji[71] relates to a document not required by law to be attested.

In the case of documents required by law to be attested, mere endorsement of the registrar will not be sufficient to prove the document; according to Section 68, one attesting witness at least has to be called for the purpose of proving its execution, except in the case of the will, unless the execution of the will is specifically denied. It was held that the presumption under Section 60(2) of the Registration Act cannot take the place of proof as required by Section 67, when the witnesses are available to prove the document in the manner provided by the Evidence Act.[72]

In the case of a registered document more than 30 years old, mere production of certified copy is not enough to prove the execution of the document. The admission of execution incorporated in the certificate issued by the registrar, is acceptable in evidence to prove to some extent the admission of the execution made by the executor before the registrar. Proof of execution under Section 67 is still necessary.[73]

8. MODES OF PROVING SIGNATURE AND HANDWRITING

It was held that the carbon copies of transport permit, written in hand by a government officer and issued as a general practice, are admissible as primary evidence for comparison of handwriting.[74]

However, the carbon copies cannot be generally relied upon, for the purpose of comparison because the impression made upon such carbon paper is generally irregular and blotched.[75]

Where the statements of the accused persons were signed by them as well as by their lawyer, and the accused, during the trial, admitted their signatures, it was held that the statements must be held to be proved and there was no necessity to examine the lawyer.[76]

Where the defendant denied the execution and consideration of the suit pronote, but alleged that he had entrusted to the plaintiff a blank paper bearing his thumb impression, it was held that the plaintiff has to prove both the fact of execution and also the advancement of consideration; that the admission of the defendant as to his thumb impression on a blank paper cannot amount to admission as to the execution of the pronote.[77]

COMMENTS

1. PRINCIPLE

This section lays down, subject to the proviso, that the documents required by law to be attested shall not be used as evidence until one attesting witness at least has been called for proving its execution, if there be an attesting witness alive, capable of giving evidence and subject to the process of the Court.

The proviso was added by the Amending Act 31 of 1926. According to it, in the case of a document other than a will, it shall not be necessary to call an attesting witness in proof of its execution if it has been registered under the provisions of the Registration Act, unless its execution by the person by whom it purports to have been executed is specifically denied. So, the position is that. if any document other than a will is registered, generally it is not necessary to call an attesting witness. But even if it is registered, if the alleged executant denies its execution, then it would become necessary to comply with the main provision by examining at least one attesting witness.

This section applies to cases where an instrument required by law to be attested bears the necessary attestation. What the section prohibits is proof of execution of a document otherwise than by the evidence of an attesting witness if available.[1]

This section applies only where the execution of a document has to be proved. Where, however, the execution is not to be proved, it is not necessary to call any attesting witness, unless it is expressly contended that the attesting witness has not witnessed the execution of the document.[2]

This section is not permissive or enabling. It lays down the necessary requirements which the Court has to observe in order that a document can be held to be proved.

2. REQUIRED BY LAW TO BE ATTESTED

The expression "required by law to be attested" means that under some enactment the document has to be attested. This means 'required by the law of the country where the property is situated'. The rule as to the law of domicile is not extended to immovable property.

2. Komalsing v. Krishnabai, (1945) 48 Bom LR 83 : ILR (1946) Bom 146 : AIR 1946 Bom 304.

The following are the documents which are required by law to be attested:

(a) A mortgage deed where the amount secured is Rs. 100 or more, vide Section 59 of the Transfer of Property Act.

(b) Gift of immovable property, vide Section 123 of the Transfer of Property Act.

(c) Wills executed by persons other than Hindus, Muslims or Buddhists— Sections 58 & 63 of Indian Succession Act, 39 of 1925.

(d) Wills made by Hindus, Jains, Sikhs and Buddhists—Section 57 of the Act 39 of 1925.

The principle underlying the section is that execution of a will must be proved by at least one attesting witness, that it is only an attesting witness who is entitled to prove the execution of the will. It is a concession that the legislature has made. If that concession does not result in complying with the mandatory requirements of this section the only proper method is to call the other attesting witness, so that both the attesting witnessess are before the Court, and the due execution of the will is proved by the two attesting witnesses which are necessary before a will can become a valid document.[3]

The necessity of examining an attesting witness would arise only when the document which is required by law to be attested is sought to be used in evidence and the execution thereof is questioned.[4]

A bond is not required by law to be attested, and production of attesting witnesses is not necessary[5], so is a sale-deed[6] and an agreement of re-conveyance.[7] Where a gift is executed by a Mahommedan in compliance with Mahomeddan Law, it was held that Section 123 of the Transfer of Property Act and Section 68 of Evidence Act do not apply even if it is by registered deed, and it can be proved without examining the attesting witnesses, under Section 72 of the Evidence Act.[8] Release deed is not a document required by law to be attested. So attesting witness need not be examined.[9]

Under Section 58, a document requiring attestation, if not attested, cannot be used as evidence until at least one attesting witness has been called for the purpose of proving its execution. A mortgage is admissible as evidence of personal covenant to pay, since such covenant does not require attestation in law.[10]

Where a gift deed and an assignment deed were in question and those documents were registered documents of more than thirty years old, it was held that there was no necessity to call the attesting witness to prove the gift deed though it was required by law to be attested by two witnesses. Regarding the deed of assignment there was no question of calling any attesting witness as it was not required by law to be attested[11] but where the provisions of Section 123, T.P.A. and Section 68 of the Evidence Act were not complied with, the gift deed was held to be inadmissible in evidence.[12]

Where a document not required to be attested, is attested the attesting witness need not be examined.

3. ATTESTATION

The word 'attested' used in this section, is not defined in this Act. But a definition of the word "attested" was given for the first time in the Transfer of Property Act, by the Amending Act 27 of 1926. Section 3 of that Act as amended reads: "attested" in relation to an instrument, means and shall be deemed always to have meant, attested by two or more witnesses each of whom has seen the executant sign, or affix his mark to the instrument, or has seen some other person sign the instrument, in the presence, and by the direction, of the executant, or has received from the executant a personal acknowledgement of his signature or mark, or of the signature of such other person and each of whom has signed the instrument in the presence of the executant; but it shall not be necessary that more than one such witness shall have been present at the same time and no particular form of attestation shall be necessary.

Section 63(c) of the Indian Succession Act (Act 39 of 1925) is also in terms identical with Section 3 of the Transfer of Property Act.

The Supreme Court in Beni Chand v. Smt. Kamala Kunwar,[13] held that by attestation is meant the signing of a document to signify that the attestor is a witness to the execution of the document; and by Section 63(c) of the Secesion Act, an attesting witness to a will is one who signs the document in the presence of the executant, after seeing the execution of the document, or after receiving a personal acknowledgement from the executant as regards the execution of the document.[14]

In Section 3 Transfer of Property Act, while defining the word "attested", the expression "personal acknowledgement of his signature" is used, as was used in Section 9 of the English Wills Act 1837 in England. "Personal acknowledgement" is not equivalent to "express acknowledgement". It is not necessary that an acknowledgement should be express and should be made verbally.[15]

"Attested" means that a person has signed the document by way of testimony to the fact that he saw it executed.[16] An attesting witness is one who signs the document in the presence of the executant, ofter seeing the execution of the document, or after receiving a personal acknowledgement of the execution of the document by the executant.[17]

The object of attestation is that some person should verify that the deed was signed voluntarily. Knowledge of the contents of a document ought not to be inferred from the mere fact of attestation.[18]

Attestation and execution are two different acts, attestation follows execution. Attestation is meant to ensure that the executant was a free agent and not under pressure or subject to fraud, while executing the document. For the purpose attestation is insisted upon under the Transfer of Property Act. To make a deed of mortgage or gift admissible in evidence it is enough to comply with the provisions of Section 68. The question whether the document really created a mortgage or a gift or not, must be proved separately by showing that the requirements of Section 59 or Section 123 of the Transfer of Property Act have been complied with.[19]

This section applies only to a document duly attested and not to one which has not been proved to be so. Where the question was whether the document is a mortgage or a simple money bond, and when the execution was not specifically denied, it was held that even then, due attestation must be proved, though not by any attesting witness, in order to take advantage of the transaction as mortgage.[20]

The object of attestation is to protect the executant from being required to execute a document by the other party thereto by force, fraud or undue influence. A mortgagee who admits execution cannot be permitted to contend that the mortgagor failed to prove the requirements of Section 59 of the Transfer of Property Act.[21]

The object of placing more attestations than one upon a document whether at the party's voluntary instance or by requirement of law, is ordinarily not to demand the combined testimony of all at the trial, but merely to provide by way of caution a number of witnesses; so that the contingencies of death, removal of residence, and the like, may be guarded against, and one witness at least may be available. But the main object in statutes requiring attestation as an element of validity is to surround the act of execution with certain safeguards; the object of securing evidence for litigation is a secondary one.[22]

4. ATTESTING WITNESS

Under Section 3 of the Transfer of Property Act, the attesting witness must see the executant sign. Where a witness was blind, he was incapable of attesting the document, as he could not see the executant sign.[23]

Where an attesting witness stated that the executant put her thumb impression in their presence it is sufficient proof of valid attestation.[24] It must be shown that the attestator signed the document in the presence of the executant.[25]

The Privy Council in Kundan v. Mushrrafi Begam, held that the expression "signed in the presence" does not necessarily mean that the attesting witness should actually see the executants sign the document. It is enough if their signatures are made under the circumstances that the executant, if he was minded to see the witnesses sign, he could have done so.[26]

The Supreme Court in Abdul Jabbar v. Venkata Sastri,[27] held that the act of attestation must be done animo attestandi i.e., with the intention to attest; the fact that one's name is on the document does not make him an attesting witness, irrespective of the purpose for which it is there.[28]

An illiterate person also may be an attesting witness by affixing his mark or finger impression. The word 'sign' includes "mark" under the General Clauses Act 10 of 1897.[29]

It is not necessary that all the attesting witnesses should be present at a time for affixing their signatures on the document.

What has to be proved is that each of the attesting witnesses saw the testator signing the will or received from the testator a personal acknowledgement of his signature and that each of the witnesses signed the will in the presence of the testator. It is not necessary that the attesting witnesses should be able to identify the signature of each other or even to know each other.[30]

5. UNTIL AT LEAST ONE ATTESTING WITNESS HAS BEEN CALLED

When one of the two attesting witnesses proved due execution of a gift deed, the other attesting witness need not be produced.[31]

In cases where the two attesting witnesses had signed in the presence of each other, it is not necessary to examine the both to prove that they had received acknowledgement from the testator or his signature or mark on the will.[32]

There is no need to produce both the witnesses who attested the documents, to prove the execution. If one is examined it is sufficient. No adverse inference can be drawn for non-production of the other.[33]

The word 'called' means tendered for the purpose of giving evidence.[34] It is not used in the sense of summoned.[35] It is not necessary for the attesting person, in order to prove execution, to point to the signature or mark made by the executant. It does not therefore follow that because a witness is unable to point to the signature on a document of the person whose signature he purports to have attested, he has failed to prove that signature.[36]

This section provides that a document cannot be held to have been proved unless one of the attesting witnesses is called where it is not established that all of them are dead or were incapable of giving evidence[37] but the fact that the said witness will prove hostile does not absolve the party from calling him as a witness and mere examination of the writer of the deed or the fact that the will was registered one was held to be not sufficient proof of its due execution.[38] Where the plaintiffs and the defendants failed to produce the only alive attesting witness in spite of having been given a number of opportunities for the same and the evidence was ordered to be closed, application for producing additional evidence was allowed as the proof of the registered will was not possible without examining the attesting witness.[39]

The words 'at least' presuppose that more evidence may be required and it can only be by reference to the circumstances of each case that the quantum of evidence necessary to discharge the onus of proof can be measured. A will duly signed by the testator and attested by two witnesses, who attest not in the presence of each other but at different times on the acknowledgement by the testator of his own signature, cannot be admitted to proof on the evidence of only one of the attesting witnesses.[40]

There is no requirement that attesting witnesses should identify each other.[41]

Where the attesting witnesses proved the execution, it was immaterial that their names were not mentioned in the will.[42] Where the sole evidence of a title was a "will" and the attesting witness failed to prove it, it would not be said that the will had been legally proved.[43]

It would not be necessary to call an attesting witness where execution of a deed was not denied, only its validity was questioned on the ground of undue influence.[44]

In the case of a mortgage deed if the evidence of one attesting witness has not been accepted, further evidence of due execution and attestation of the mortgage deed is necessary.[45]

6. EXECUTION BY PARDANASHIN WOMEN

When women signed behind the purdah and the identifier stated that they are his wives, though the witnesses did not see the women putting their signatures, it was held that the deed was properly attested.[46] Where the attesting witnesses were acquainted with the voice of the lady and recognised it, it was held that though the witnesses were unable to see the face of the lady who was sitting behind a chick, the document was duly attested.[47]

Where a woman executed a document sitting behind a purdah and her son took the document to her and brought back the deed bearing her signature and said that the deed was signed by his mother, and witnesses thereupon attested it, it was held that the document was not properly attested as the attestor did not take the personal acknowledgement from the executant of her signature.[48]

A party to a document is not competent to attest.[49] A power of attorney agent executing the deed for another cannot be an attesting witness to it.[50]

7. PROOF OF ATTESTATION

The direct evidence of the attestor will be "primary evidence". If there is no attesting witness alive, then the document must be proved in the manner provided by Sections 47 and 73.

Where the plaintiff got issued the summons to the attesting witnesses under Order XVI, Rule 8, CPC., and they were not served, it was held that the responsibility of the plaintiff did not end and that he must take coercive steps under Order XVI, Rule 10, CPC., for securing their attendence in court; if that was not done, it would not amount to compliance with Section 68, regarding proof of attestation.[51]

Failure to call an attesting witness where it is not established that all of the attesting witnesses are dead or are incapable of giving evidence, is a fatal defect, and the document cannot be held to have been proved.[52]

Where the document concerned is not the foundation of a suit, non-compliance with Section 68 does not prevent the document from being used in evidence for a collateral purpose.[53]

When both parties admit the execution formal proof of execution is not necessary.[54] Where a document was admitted after formal proof is waived, it means admission by the party waiving such formal proof, of due execution of the document. If the execution itself is admitted the question of proving execution of the document by the attesting witnesses would not arise.[55] Where the mortgagee stated that the defendant executed the document, but he was not cross-examined regarding the details of the execution or about attestation, though it was generally denied, by the mortgagor in his written statement, it was held that it would be presumed there was due execution and also attestation as there is no attack on due execution.[56] Where the defendant admitted the execution and also the attestation signatures, but contended that the attesting witnesses had not seen the mortgagor signing the document it was held that it is for the defendant to prove such contention, as there would be presumption of due execution and attestation on the admission of the defendant.[57]

This section applies only where the execution of a document has to be proved. Where however, the execution is not to be proved, it is not necessary to call any attesting witness, unless it is expressly contended that the attesting witness has not witnessed the execution of the document.[58] Where the execution or the attestation of the will is not in dispute, there is no need to comply with the requirement of calling at least one attesting witness.[59]

Execution means not only signing by the person executing the document but also the attestation of his signature by witnesses where it requires such attestation.[60]

It was held that, even though the attesting witnesses are defendants in the case, they should be examined as attesting witnesses; on their denying their attestation, they could be treated as hostile and then the plaintiff would be in a position to prove the execution of the document in another manner. Merely because they are defendants, the responsibility cast on the plaintiff under Section 68 is not discharged.[61]

Where an attesting witness deposed that he had attested the mortgage bond, and the other attestor has also witnessed its execution, it is sufficient evidence of valid attestation.[62]

Where one attesting witness states that the executant signed in his presence but did not state about the attestation by the other attesting witnesses, it was held that it was necessary to prove that the document was properly attested by the other attesting witnesses.[63]

When the attestation is not specifically challenged, and the witness is not cross-examined, regarding the details of the attestation, it is sufficient for him to say that the document was attested by the other witnesses and himself, and it is sufficient proof of attestation under this section.[64]

Where one of the attesting witnesses was called and his evidence was disbelieved, it was held that it cannot be said that the provisions of Section 68 were complied with.[65]

In such a case it cannot be presumed that the document was attested by the other signatory.[66]

Though the witnesses required to prove the attestation might not have stated that they put the signature in the presence of the executant, if there is evidence showing their presence at the time of the execution and of the registration of the document at the same time and at the same place, it can be legitimately inferred that the witnesses put their signatures in the presence of the executants, after having seem them signing the instrument.[67]

Mere production of an entry in the document writers register cannot be taken as proof of attestation of the will.[68]

Where a document is written, executed and attested in one ink the presumption of due attestation is permissible under the maxim "Omnia presumuntur rite at solenniter esse act aonec probetur in contrarium".[69]

Where the original document consisting of two sheets attested by two witnesses and the first sheet was removed and substituted by two sheets not attested by those witnesses and that too without the consent of the executant, it was held that the document of three sheets cannot be said to have been properly attested and executed; that the admission before the registrar of the execution was not sufficient proof of execution.[70]

Where the only available attesting witness to a mortgage deed denies his attestation, it is permissible to prove the deed by calling its writer under Section 71 to depose to the execution of the deed by the mortgagor and to its attestation by the two witnesses.[71]

8. PROOF OF EXECUTION OF A REGISTERED DOCUMENT [PROVISO]

The proviso was added by Act XXXI of 1926. It simplifies the difficulty of calling attesting witnesses where the document to be proved is a registered one and is not a will and its execution is not specifically denied by the person executing it.[72] If the attestation is not specifically denied it is not necessary to call any attesting witness.[73]

What has to be specifically denied is the execution of the document and a mere denial of the genuineness of the document is not enough to indicate that the execution of the document was denied.[74]

The Madras High Court has held that the proviso has a retrospective effect as it relates to procedural law and not to substantive law. If the execution of a deed required to be attested by law is not denied by the executant, it need not be proved by any attesting witness, though it might have been executed before the enactment of the proviso.[75]

9. MEANING [EXECUTION]

The word "execution" in the proviso not only means signing by the executant but means and includes all the series of acts which would give validity to the document concerned.[76]

Mere admission by the executant of the mortgage bond that it has been signed by him cannot dispense with the proof of attestation.[77]

The word "execution" is hardly apt when used in regard to the drafting of a letter and is only appropriate in regard to a deed or instrument, and in such cases, certain formalities are insisted upon by law and they are to be followed by the executant in order to make the document effective in law.[78]

Where the defendant pleaded in his statement that he did not admit execution or receipt of consideration one has to prove both execution and consideration of the document. The contention that there was no specific denial of signature and attestation cannot be accepted.[79]

Where the true copy of the power of attorney shows that the original was not signed by the managing director of a company and does not bear the seal of the company, it was held that there was no proper execution of the power of attorney.[80]

In the case of a will it was held that affixing of thumb mark on the document is not a necessary legal requirement of execution. It can be executed by putting a pen mark on it, but if the thumb mark is on the back of the will, it is not execution of the will[81] but where the deceased the executant of the will put his signature in the presence of the witnesses who put their signature in the presence of the executant and the advocate, drafting the will, put his signature after seeing that the executant and the witnesses had so put their signature, it was held that the will was properly executed and attested.[82]

Execution of a document implies intelligent and conscious appreciation of the contents and the facts connected with the document. Where the thumb mark or signature is affixed to a piece of blank paper and which does not contain necessary contents of the transaction there is no execution of the document.[83]

As regards a will execution means and implies testamentary capacity as well as formal execution and attestation.[84]

The certificate of the registrar is prima facie evidence of execution and also conclusive when there is no evidence to throw any doubt.[85] Where the Sub-Registrar had endorsed a registered will that the executant of the will was introduced to him by the lambardar of a village and the executant admitted execution of the will and signed in his presence but the Sub-Registrar could not say whether the lambardar who identified the executant was a Harijan or someone else and the scribe deposed that he did not know the executants of the will, the Court doubted its genuineness.[86]

Mere proof of signature of a party to a document is not a same thing as proving due execution of the document.[87]

10. SPECIFICALLY DENIES

The words "specifically denied" means specifically denied by the party against whom it is sought to be used and not only by the executant. Where, therefore, a party against whom a document is sought to be used denied its execution, even though the executant does not do so, it is necessary to call an attesting witness to prove it.[88]

A third party who is a party to a mortgage suit but not to the mortgage deed can deny execution and require proof of attestation when the executant of the deed admits execution.[89]

Where the plaintiff alleged that the executant of the gift deed was so old and infirm that he could not understand the nature of the document, the Court said that it was not "a specific denial".[90] A mere general denial of a mortgage or not admitting it cannot be regarded as a specific denial of its execution within the meaning of the provisio to this section. When there is only a general denial of the execution and there is no cross-examination regarding attestation of a witness who comes forward to swear to execution then it can be presumed that there was due attestation.[91] Attacking a document as a sham and nominal transaction would not amount to a specific denial of execution.[92] A plea that the plaintiff was not aware of the execution of a document does not amount to specific denial.[93] The law requires not a mere denial but a specific denial which means, not only that the denial must be in express terms but it should be definite and unambigious what has to be specifically denied is the execution of the document. Other contentions not distinctly referring to the execution of the document by the alleged executant are not covered by the expression denial in the proviso.[94]

When the borrower did not specifically deny execution of the mortgage deed but only alleged that it was got by coercion and undue influence and was not supported fully by consideration, it was held that the execution of the deed was admitted and therefore it was not required to be proved by one atleast of the attesting witnesses.[95] Where the execution of a mortgage deed was specifically denied, and the attesting witness was not examined on the ground that he was won over, it was held that it was not a sufficient ground for considering other evidence to prove execution.[96]

The specific denial of execution of a document must be in a proceeding before a court. If the execution or the attestation is specifically denied in the written statement the plaintiff is bound to produce an attesting witness to prove execution or the attestation.[97] When execution of a gift deed is specifically denied attesting witness has to be called for proof but not where the donor specifically admitted its execution.[98] If it is not denied in the pleading there is no necessity to call the attesting witness.[99]

Where the execution is not specifically denied, attestation can be proved by any other method without taking recourse to the provisions of Section 68 which would come into operation only when the execution is specifically denied.[1]

It is only when there is specific denial by the defendant of the execution of the document, the plaintiff is to give strict proof of the execution under Section 68.[2]

In a suit for redemption of a unsufructuary mortgage where the execution of the mortgage deed was not denied by the mortgagee, it was held that as the deed was not attested it is invalid but a decree could be granted for redemption on the basis of mortgagor's title, as the mortgage was not denied.[3]

11. EXCEPTIONS TO THE ABOVE RULE

The rule enshrined in this section is however, subject to certain exceptions. PHIPSON enumerates the exceptions in para 40-18, p. 1086-88 - 13th edition. The exceptions with reference to Indian Law may be stated as hereunder:

(1) When the opponent by his prior conduct is estopped from denying execution. The adverse party may be estopped from disputing the document by the recital in a deed to which he is a party and under which he has acquited some benefit on the faith of the document recited being valid.

(2) When although producing it, the opponent claims an interest under the same instrument in the cause: his claim of interest predicates an admission of its validity or genuineness.

(3) When the document is tendered against a public officer, who is bound by law to have it executed and who has dealt with it as a document duly executed.

(4) When the attesting witness has signed the instrument merely in pursuance of a rule in some court and such court has subsequently recognised the validity of the instrument by acting upon it.

(5) When the attesting witness refuses to testify; where the attestator is privileged not to testify and thus is not compellable and where the attestor, though not privileged, nevertheless refuses to testify, the proponent should be excused, provided it is made to appear that there is no collusion.

(6) When the party to an attested document has admitted the execution of the document for purpose of the trial (vide Section 70).

(7) When the document is proved to be in the possession of adverse party and he refuses to produce it after notice. Then the secondary evidence can be given in which case the court also be presumed due execution and attestation unless and until it is disproved. (vide Section 65 & Section 89). The person refusing to produce the document cannot be allowed to rebut the presumption by his producing the document subsequently without the consent of the opposite party or the order of the court. (Vide Section 164).

(8) When the document is thirty years old and where the court presumes under Section 90 about the attestation then proof can be dispensed with.

(9) When the attesting witness is dead or is not available on account of any physical or legal obstacle like imprisonment, insanity, infirmity, blindness, absence of jurisdiction, etc., the proof of execution by attesting witness can be dispensed with and may be proved by other means (vide Section 69).

(10) When the attesting witness does not recollect or denies the execution. (Vide Section 71).

(11) In the case of wills when probate is granted by a competent court, it would be sufficient evidence of the validity and contents of the will and in such cases attestation need not be proved. (Vide Exception 2 of Section 91).

12. SHALL NOT BE USED

These words mean that the document cannot be used in a suit for enforcement of the document, leaving the ordinary provisions of law in Section 67 to apply where the document is to be used for any other purpose. Although a document cannot be used in evidence as a mortgage deed, which requires attestation, yet this section does not prevent it from being used in evidence for the purpose of proving it as an acknowledgement saving limitation.[4]

13. WILLS—PROOF

Proof of the will is to be made either in the Court of law or any procedure known to law provided under the Registration Act without which no right can be acquired under it.[5]

The onus of proving a will is on the propounder. Proof of the signature of the testator, the testamentary capacity, and at the time of execution the testator was in a sound and disposing state of mind have to be proved.[6] The testator should speak not only about the testator's signature of affixing his mark to the will, or somebody else signing it in his presence and by his direction, but that he had attested the will after taking acknowledgement from the testator of his signature or mark. He should also depose that each of the witnesses had signed the will in the presence of the testator. The attestor's participation even at the time of registration does not dispense with the proof of execution and attestation of a will in accordance with Section 68[7] and the propounder has to examine at least one attesting witness to prove this.[8] Where the fact of giving instructions for preparation of the will by the testator and his presenting it for registration after acknowledging the execution of it, were proved and there being no vitiating circumstances to rebut the presumption as to the regularity of its execution or to the same or to throw any doubt about it, the finding about it being validly executed called for no interference.[9]

Section 68 is mandatory and one attesting witness at least has to be called to prove the execution. Where the only living attesting witness omits to testify, such omission cannot be cured with evidence of other witnesses like the scribe, or a beneficiary under the will.[10] The statement of the scribe of a will can be taken to be the statement of an attesting witness.[11] Where the attesting witnesses of a will were not examined to prove its execution, examination of the identifying witness who had seen the process of the testator executing and signing the will in his presence, was held to be not sufficient to prove its execution. Besides there were suspicious circumstances.[12]

Where the propounder who was the beneficiary under the will examined only one attestor as required under Section 68 and did not examine other witnesses, it was held that the propunder was under a duty to examine all available witnesses and to produce the best available (witness and to produce the best available) evidence in support of the execution of the will[13] but where the will was registered and was duly proved as per requirement of law, it was not necessary to examine the advocate who drafted the will and the typist who typed it.[14]

On a harmonious interpretation of the relevant provisions of the Succession Act and the Evidence Act, it can safely be laid down that for proper proof of a will at least one of the attestators, if alive, should be examined and that whatever is not proved through him should be proved through other evidence, direct or circumstantial.[15]

Where a certified copy of the will reciting the factum of adoption was sought to be relied on, it was held that proof of execution of the will is essential.[16]

When the Sub-Registrar by his evidence proved a certified copy of a will, it was held that the execution of the will and the disposing state of the mind of the testator were proved.[17]

It was held that when all the surviving attestors were examined in proof of the execution of the will, non-examination of the scribe is of little consequence.[18]

In the former Jaipur State prior to 1943 there was no Succession Act or any law requiring a will to be attested. Dealing with a case of a will of that State, it was held that when the scribe of the registered will deposed that he wrote the will on the instructions of the testatrix who later affixed her thumb impression after he had read over and explained the will to her, the will should be held to be duly proved.[19] Where the testator had put his signature at the end of the will after the schedule of the properties was set out in it and thereafter the attestators had put their signatures, it was held to be duly executed. Failure of the testator to sign on one of the pages of the will would not make the will incomplete or inoperative.[20]

Although in a proceedings for probate of the will one attesting witness as required by Section 81 of the Succession Act was examined, an affidavit should be filed by the attesting witness proving the execution as required by Section 68 in the regular proceedings.[21]

Where a plaintiff produced a will but it was not exhibited, and the defendant made use of the will in cross-examination of the plaintiff and it was marked as an exhibit at the instance of the defendant, it was held that the defendant must be taken to have waived the requirement of formal proof.[22]

Where the original will was not produced and the only attesting witness produced stated that he was not aware of the execution or being thumb marked of any will by the testator and the propounder failed to prove the tastator's disposing mind free from extraneous influences and his sound disposing mind when he executed the will, the will could not be said to have been proved.[23] Where the attesting witness denied the execution of the will, it was held that the execution can be proved by other evidence[24] and where the evidence of the attesting witness is vague, the Court cannot conclude that the will has not been proved. It should take into consideration all the circumstances before reaching any conclusion.[25]

The proviso to Section 68 is not applicable in the case of wills, but, as the will is a document required by law to be attested the main provision in Section 68 is applicable. The expression 'called' in the section is not used in the sense of 'summoned'. The expression 'clearly' means tendered for the purpose of giving evidence. If one of the attesting witnesses had not been called for the purpose of proving its execution, the will is not admissible as evidence under Section 68. [26]

Where it was alleged that there was conspiracy with the witnesses to concot the will, it was held that when the terms of the will are natural and proper and the execution and attestation was proved by disinterested witnesses; the testamantory capacity was established and conspiracy to concot to the will could not be attributed.[27]

In the absence of suspicious circumstances like undue influence or fraud or coercion, surrounding the execution of the will, the proof of testamantory capacity and signature of the testator as required by law are sufficient to discharge the onus.[28] Where the testator lived for nearly five years after the execution and registration of the will without making any attempt to cancel it and the evidence of the attestors was found to be credible, mere fact the plaintiff accompanied the testator on the date of its execution does not create suspicion as to influence or doubt as to its genuineness.[29]

If the proof as envisaged by Section 68 falls short of the legal requirements, it cannot be taken into consideration.[30]

In a proceeding to obtain probate of a will be a legatee, one of the three brothers named as opposite parties filed no objection affidavit for the issue of probate, and three attesting witnesses supported the genuineness of the will; it was held that the petitioner/legatee is entitled to the grant of probate.[31]

Where the bequest was in favour of wife and children excluding the eldest son from inheritence, and one of the attesting witnesses denied attestation in the presence of the testator, it was held that when the terms of the will are rational and it was executed in sound state of mind, the legatees can be granted letters of administration.[32]

Where a witness stated that a certain person cancelled his will through a publication in his newspaper on a certain date, neither the publication nor his statement was held to be sufficient proof of the will in question.[33]

Where the will in question was a registered document of more than 30 years, with no suspicious circumstance regarding its execution and all the attesting witnesses and the scribe were dead, its genuineness was presumed.[34]

14. SCRIBE OR IDENTIFYING WITNESS AS ATTESTING WITNESS

Different views were expressed by different High Courts on the question as to whether, and if so in what circumstances, a scribe can be treated as an attesting witness. One view is that the scribe cannot be treated as an attesting witness, even though the deed may in fact have been executed in his presence. A contrary view was expressed in other cases. A third view is that the scribe may perform a dual role; he may be an attesting witness as well as a writer. Though the prima facie inference in a case where a person describes himself as the scribe, is that he signs as the writer and nothing else, it can be shown that he signed not only as a writer, but as a witness of the fact that he saw the document executed or received an acknowledgement from the executant that he had executed it.[35]

The Supreme Court has clarified the position in: Abdul Jabbar v. Venkata Sastri.[36] It observed: "This was an appeal against the judgement of the High Court where on a reference Full Bench had to consider the question whether an earlier decision of a Full Bench in Veerappa Chettiar v. Sobrahmanya Ayyar,[37] required reconsideration. [H. Venkata Sastri v. Rahilna Bi,[38]] observed: "In our opinion, such signatures of the registering officer and the identifying witnesses endorsed on a mortgage document can be treated as those of attesting witnesses if (1) the signatories are those who have seen the execution or received a personal acknowledgement from the executant of his having executed the document, (2) they sign their names in the presence of the executant and (3) while so doing they had the animus to attest. The mere presence of the signatures of the registering officer of the identifying witnesses on the registration endorsements would not by themselves be sufficient to satisfy the requirements of a valid attestation; but it would be competent for the parties to show by evidence that any or all of these persons did in fact intend to and did sign as attesting witness as well".

Abdul Jabbar v. Venkata Sastri,[39] it is observed at page 111: "It is essential that the witness should have put his signature animo attestandi, that is, for the purpose of attesting that he has seen the executant sign or has received from him a personal acknowledgement for some other purpose, e.g., to certify that he is a scribe or an identifier or a registering officer, he is not an attesting witness".

"In every case the court must be satisfied that the names were written animo attestandi."[40] Evidence is admissible to show whether the witness had the intention to attest. "The attesting witnesses must subscribe with the intention that the subscription made should be complete attestation of the will, and evidence is admissible to show whether such was the intention or not.[41]" The Supreme Court held that the two persons who had identified the testator at the time of the registration of the will and had appended their signatures at the foot of the endorsement by the Sub-Registrar, were not attesting witnesses, as their signatures were not put "animo attestandi".[42] Subscribing a signature on the part of the scribe cannot be equated with that of the signature of an attesting witness which is the requirement of the statute.[43] The Calcutta High Court has held that a person who had put his name under the word "scribe" was not an attesting witness, as he had put his signature only for the purpose of authenticating that he was a "scribe".[44] The Privy Council held that the legatees who had put their signatures on will in token of their consent to its execution were not attesting witnesses and were not disqualified from taking as legatees.[45]

The Supreme Court had to consider whether the Sub-Registrar before whom the executant admitted execution at the time of registration and the identifying witnesses could be considered as attesting witnesses. The Supreme Court observed that prima facie the registering officer puts his signature on the document in discharge of his statutory duty under Section 59 of the Registration Act, and not for the purpose of attesting it. In that case, it was not proved that he put his signature with the intention of attesting the document. Similarly the identifying witnesses were not shown to have put their signatures for the purpose of attesting the document. Therefore the Sub-Registrar and the identifying witnesses were not treated as attesting witnesses. The Supreme Court cited with approval Surendra Bahadur Singh v. Thakur Behari Singh.[46]

In M. Venkatasubbiah v. M. Subbamma,[47] the judges relied on Paramhansa v. Krishna[48]; Ayyaswami Iyengar v. Kyalaswami Pilla.[49]

The decision of the Supreme Court was followed in Rajyalakshmamma v. Satyavani[50] in which it was pointed out that the view expressed in M. Venakta Subbaiah v. M. Subbamma[51] cannot be approved in view of the decision of the Supreme Court dissenting from Jarnail Singh v. Narain Singh[52]; see also K. Nookaraju v. P. Venkatarao.[53]

In cases coming under the Transfer of Property Act, where the document becomes complete and valid only on registration, the Sub-Registrar and the identifying witness of registration may not become attesting witnesses, but in a case where the document is a will (which is excluded from the proviso) which does not require registration, the Sub-Registrar and the identifying witnesses, if they conform to the law regarding attestation, may become attesting witnesses.[54]

In the absence of evidence to prove that the identifying witnesses were present at the time of actual execution of the document; their attestation will not prove due execution of the document. If signatures of the two persons appearing at the foot of the endorsement of the registration of a will, were of the same persons who attested the document as required under Section 68, then it can be construed that they have appended their signatures in their capacity as attesting witnesses to the will.[55]

Proof where no attesting witness found.

S. 69. If no such attesting witness can be found, or if the document purports to have been executed in the United Kingdom, it must be proved that the attestation of one attesting witness at least is in his handwriting, and that the signature of the person executing the document is in the handwriting of that person.

COMMENTS

1. PRINCIPLE AND SCOPE

This section gives an alternative method of proof of documents required to be attested by law. It applies: (1) if no such attesting witness can be found; (2) if the document purports to have been executed in the United Kingdom. In these two cases, it must be proved that the attestation of one of the attesting witnesses at least is in his handwriting. It should also be proved that the signature of the person executing the document is in the handwriting of that person. This means any person who can identify the signature and the handwriting of the executant and of one attesting witness's signature, can prove the document according to this Section. This Section has to be read with Section 68 which deals with the question of proof of a document which requires attestation.[56]

The Evidence Act was enacted when India was a part of the British Empire. Reference to the United Kingdom in this and other sections still appear. This anachronism should be removed by suitable amendments. Apparently, this aspect has escaped the attention of our legislators.

This section would come into play when no attesting witness can be found.[57] Where none of the attesting witnesses of a document is available, this section declares that the signature of at least one of them must be proved by a witness.[58] Where one of the attesting witnesses of a will was not examined and the other refused to support the will, the scribe of the will and the doctor who certified the testator's mental condition to execute the will could be viewed as attesting witnesses from their testimony validating the execution of the will.[59]

Due diligence on the part of the party is required in tracing the attesting witnesses. The court must be satisfied that, in spite of diligent search, they could not be found. Then only one can take the aid of this section.[60] The party should exhaust all the processes of the court to compel the attendance of any one of the attesting witnesses, and only when it is not possible to produce that witness, either legally or physically, this section can be availed of.[61]

Section 69 can be invoked only when the absence of the attesting witnesses is sufficiently accounted for. If the attesting witness denies the signatures or does not recollect the execution of the document, its execution may be proved by other evidence.[62]

The law of attestation of wills is contained in Section 63 (c) of the Indian Succession Act, and the mode of proving the documents required by law to be attested has been laid down in Sections 68 to 72 of the Evidence Act. Nothing in these provisions makes it a necessary element in proof of attestation that the signatures of the attesting witnesses of a will should be identified.[63] Where there was no suspicion as to the unnaturalness of or tampering with a more than 30 year old will whose executant and the attesting witnesses were not alive, presumption could be raised in favour of it.[64]

The words "if no such attesting witness can be found" are not very appropriate; they must be interpreted to include not only cases where the witnesses cannot be produced because they cannot be traced, but cases where the witness, for reasons of physical or mental disability, or for other reasons, which the court considers sufficient, is no longer a competent witness for the purpose, as is provided in Section 88 of the Evidence Act.[65]

Where the executant, who was an illiterate, denied execution, and all the attesting witnesses were either dead or turned hostile or were not available, it was held that there was no rule of law which prevented a court from holding the execution proved, when the signature of the attesting witnesses were proved to the satisfying of the court, regard being had also to the circumstances of the case.[66]

Where the executant and the attesting witnesses of a gift-deed were dead, execution of the document would be proved by the proof of the signature of at least one of the attesting witnesses and that of the executant.[67]

When the signature of an attesting witness is proved, it is evidence of everything upon the face of the instrument, since it is to be presumed that the witness would not have subscribed his name in attestation of that which did not take place.[68]

Admission of execution by party to attested document.

S. 70. The admission of a party to an attested document of its execution by himself shall be sufficient proof of its execution as against him, though it be a document required by law to be attested.

COMMENTS

1. PRINCIPLE AND SCOPE

Unlike the English rule that the attesting witnesses must be called though the execution of the document is admitted by the party to it, this section states that if the party admits execution of an attested document it shall be sufficient proof of its execution as against him, though it be a document required by law to be attested.

This section is an exception to the general rule contained in Section 68 which states that "If a document is required by law to be attested, it shall not be used as evidence until one attesting witness atleast has been called for the purpose of proving its execution." This exception must be read in the light of the words used in it and by so reading the section, the meaning is that an examination of an attesting witness will not be necessary for the purpose of proving the execution of the document required by law to be attested if the executant admits the execution.[69]

This section operates where the person relying on a document has not given any evidence at all of the due execution of the document by the executant but relies on an admission of execution by the latter. If a mortgagor admits execution of a document in the written statement, it is wholly unnecessary for the mortgagee to adduce any evidence as to the execution of the document. Where the execution of a mortgage bond was admitted by the executant, it was held that there was no necessity to call any attesting witness.[70]

Where the defendant admitted the execution in the written statement it was held that the document should be taken as proved even though the attesting witness stated that the executant did not sign in his presence.[71]

The word used in Section 70 is "execution" of a document and not "signature" of the executant as used in Section 69. Admission of "execution" in this section was held not only to mean an admission of signature but also the valid attestation of the signature by the two witnesses as required by law.[72]

Where an accused admitted the signature on a certain document in a statement prepared in English, it was held that the admission of mere signature on the document by itself does not prove the contents thereof, that the accused did not know the English language but signed on it, and that in the absence of the attesting witnesses being examined the document could not be treated as proved.[73] Admission of signature does not dispense with the proof of attestation as required by law.[74]

A reading of this section shows that it applies only to a document duly attested. It was observed those words (of Section 70) apply only to a document duly attested. The mortgage deed here in question was not, in a legal sense attested; for it was merely signed by persons who professed to be witnesses to its execution, although in truth and in fact they were not so".[75]

An attested document means a duly attested one and the execution that is contemplated in this section is a due execution or execution in accordance with what the law requires for a particular document, so if a question of attestion is put in issue, it is incumbent on the plaintiff to prove that the document has been duly attested before this section can be relied on.[76]

Admission of execution is binding against the executant only and not on others.[77] The persons claiming through him are not bound by such admission.

Signature of the executant of mortgage bonds is required by Section 59 of the Transfer of Property Act to be attested by two witnesses. Under Section 68 of this Act at least one attesting witness should be called to prove the document by stating that it was duly attested, then only on the strength of the evidence given by the attesting witness, the provisions of Section 70 can be invoked.[78]

Where it appears on the face of a document or it is positively made out by the evidence on record that a document required by law to be attested has not been attested in accordance with law this section cannot be applied in spite of the admission of party to an attested document of its execution by himself for the simple reason that a Court cannot shut its eyes to obvious facts appearing on the face of a document or on the record.[79]

"Admission" referred to is admission of a validly attested document which means that when a party admits execution of the documents, he thereby not only admits the mere signing thereof but also the entire series of acts which would give validity to the document concerned.[80]

The Bombay High Court has held that there is no reason for holding that where a party admits execution within the meaning of Section 70, he must necessarily be taken to admit that the document has been attested as required by Section 59 of the Transfer of Property Act.

When the defendant disputes the claim generally, but does not dispute the execution or attestation, proof of the document can be dispensed with.[81]

When the execution is admitted and the attestation on the bond as required by law is denied the attestation must be strictly proved.[82]

The Madras High Court has held that the legislature contemplates a distinction between admissions made for the purpose of dispensing with proof at the trial and evidentiary admission, the scope and purpose of the two classes of admissions are distinct. The one relates to relevancy and the other relates solely to proof at the trial.[83]

The above case referred to an old decision[84] wherein it was observed: "The attesting witness must be called to prove the execution of a deed for this reason, that by an imperative rule of law, the parties are supposed to have agreed inter se that the deed shall not be given in evidence without his being called to depose to the circumstances attesting its execution. If, therefore, the attesting witness is not called, the deed cannot be read, because this agreement cannot be broken; but any agreement may be waived by the parties to it. If, then, in the course of the proceedings in the cause, the party to the deed admits the execution or if by his pleadings he does not require the execution to be proved, he may be very reasonably said to have waived the agreement, and the other party, accepting the waiver, does not call the attesting witness, in equity an admission in the defendant's answer is sufficient, and is a waiver of the agreement; but, where bill and answer are the pleadings, and the defendant has put the execution of the deed in issue, and he is called and compelled as a witness to prove the fact, how can that be put reasonably as a waiver of the agreement not to give the deed in evidence without calling the attesting witness. Manifestly it is no waiver at all".

The Calcutta and the Allahabad High Courts have held that the word admission relates only to the admission of a party in the course of the trial of a suit, and not to the attestation of a document by the admission of the party executing it. In other words, it has no relation to any admission of execution made before an attesting witness without reference to any suit or proceeding.[85] But the Patna and the Rangoon High Courts have laid down that an admission under this section is admissible in evidence even though it be an admission not made in the course of legal proceedings pending before a Court of Justice, but is an admission made antecedent to the institution of legal proceedings.[86]

The Madras High Court has adopted the view of the Calcutta and the Allahabad High Courts and held that the admission within the meaning of this section must be an admission made for the purpose of or having reference to the cause either in the pleading or during the course of the trial.

Admission should be by a party.—Admission of execution contemplated in Section 70 relates only to the person who has actually executed or purported to have executed the document.[87]

An admission by the heir of the executant would not serve the requirement of law and the benefit of the section would not be available.[88]

Interpretation of words in a receipt for payment of rent does not make it inadmissible.[89]

SIR, JAMES STEPHEN in his digest of the law of evidence in (Art. 66) states "that the attesting witness can be dispensed with only in cases where the admission has been made for the purpose of or having reference to the cause".

2. THE ADMISSION MUST BE UNQUALIFIED

The admission to be effective under this section must be unqualified. It was held that mere admission of thumb impression or the signatures on a blank sheet of paper, as stated by the executant does not mean an admission of execution which means that the executant must have signed or put his thumb impression after the document is fully read out.[90]

Where the mortgagor while admitting the signature denied due attestation, it was held that marking the document as an exhibit without objection, could not absolve the mortgagee from proving due attestation, as the admission was a qualified one.[91]

3. CERTIFIED COPIES OF ADMISSION

The admission of the executant incorporated in the certificate of the Registering Officer is evidence of execution, but mere production of a certified copy of such endorsement of the Registering Officer is not enough to prove execution.[92]

The certificate of admission of execution endorsed by the Registering Officer, cannot be used as an admission within the meaning of Section 70, though it may be prima facie evidence under Section 71.[93]

Proof when attesting witness denies the execution.

S. 71. If the attesting witness denies or does not recollect the execution of the document, its execution may be proved by other evidence.

COMMENTS

1. PRINCIPLE AND SCOPE

STEPHEN in his Digest (7th Ed., Art. 67, p. 78) gives three circumstances under which an attesting witness, though alive, need not be called upon, to prove the attestation and execution of a document.

(1) Where the parties admit the execution of the document for the purpose of the trial.

(2) Where the opponent is given a notice to produce the document and the opponent declines to produce it.

(3) Where such opponent produces the document on being so required, but claims an interest under the document with respect to the subject matter of the suit.

To these may be added following instances where attesting witness need not be called:

(1) Where the document purports to be 30 years old.

(2) Where the party against whom the document is tendered is a public officer who is legally bound to get it duly executed and who has treated it as such.

(3) Where estoppel prevents the opponent from questioning the document by reason of a recital in it.

This section enables the party to prove the document by other evidence when the attesting witness denies the execution of the document or does not recollect its execution. Section 67 of this Act deals with the proof of signature or the handwriting on the document. In the case of documents not required by law to be attested, one may take the aid of Section 67, but this section applies to all documents, whether they require attestation, or not, under any law.

STEPHEN in his Digest (7th Ed., Art. 68, P. 78) states: "where an attesting witness has denied all knowledge of the matter, the case stands as if there was no attesting witness, and the execution of the document may be proved by independent evidence aliunde[1]." Where the attesting witness denied the attestation of the will, evidence of the scribe and the other witnesses was admissible to prove its execution.[2]

This section is a sort of safeguard introduced by the Legislature to the mandatory provisions of Section 68, where it is not possible to prove the execution of the will by calling attesting witnesses, though alive. This section can only be requisitioned when the attesting witnesses, who have been called, fail to prove the execution of the will by reason of either their denying their own signatures, or denying the signature of the testator, or having no recollection as to the execution of the document.

For the applicability of this section it would be incumbent on the party to call the attesting witness, in compliance with Section 68, which says that at least one attesting witness should be called for the purpose of proving the execution of the document.[3]

The Privy Council in Surendra v. Behari,[4] settled the question, in the event of one of two or more attesting witnesses being called and his denying the execution, or his not recollecting the execution whether it is permissible to give other evidence without calling the other attesting witnesses, if available. The Privy Council stated that there was no intention on the part of the Legislature to depart from the rule of Egnlish Law that other evidence should not be allowed, unless all the attesting witnesses alive, and subject to the process of the Court, are called or their absence has been satisfactorily explained.[5]

It was further held by the Privy Council in the above case that registration proceedings can be relied upon under this section to prove due execution or attestation.

In the case of a will, the attestor was declared hostile. It was held that other evidence, showing proper execution of the will, can be relied upon.[6]

A will has got to be executed as required by Section 63 of the Indian Succession Act, and is a document which is required by law to be attested. Section 68 of the Evidence Act requires that at least one attesting witness, if he is alive and subject to the process of the Court, should be called to prove the execution of a compulsorily attestable document. As Section 71 is in the nature of an exception, when the attesting witness denies the execution of the will, it can be proved by other evidence. What weight should be given to such other evidence is a different matter.[7]

This section has no application where the attesting witness is not actually before the court, because no question of his denying or failing to recollect the execution of the document can arise then.[8]

In the case of a will, it was held that, the words "execution of a will" comprehend the attestation in testator's presence; that, therefore, the testimony of a non-attesting witness under Section 71 is of no help, and the will must be held as not properly proved.[9]

The section has no application when one attesting witness has failed to prove the execution of the will and other attesting witnesses are available who could prove the execution if they were called[10], identification of the signature of the testator by a person knowing him, will only mean that the document contains the signature of the executor; that will not amount to proof of the execution of the document by a person by whom it purports to have been executed, as there is possibility of the executor's signature having been taken on blank paper or on a misrepresentation that the document represents a different transaction.[11]

Under this section execution of a document includes attestation.[12]

The attestation of a document does not amount to an admission of its contents by the attesting person, unless it can be proved that the document was read over to him and that he made the attestation after being conscious of the statement made in the document.[13]

There is no requirement that the attesting witnesses should identify each other.[14]

In PHIPSON on Evidence 15th Edn. (2000), Page: 1086, Para : 40-17 it is observed: "Where the witness has no recollection of the execution, but from seeing his signature has no doubt that it took place, this is sufficient proof.[15] And where a person who saw the execution, afterwards subscribed his name without the knowledge or request of the parties[16]; or, where one of the latter had subscribed a fictitious name as witness[17], the execution was allowed to be proved as if there were no witness, i.e., by evidence of the handwriting of the party executing, or otherwise. If the attesting witnesses to a will refuse to make an affidavit of execution, the court may order their examination in court[18]; or dispense with their evidence and accept that of the executor alone[19]. And where an attesting witness denies the execution, other evidence thereof is admissible, and the document may be upheld in spite of such denial[20], though where the denial is distinct and positive and there is nothing to throw doubt upon it, the attestation will be rejected[21]. A party, however, is not bound to call a hostile attesting witness if there be another available[22]. Where both the attesting witnesses gave evidence that the testator did not subscribe the will until after they had done so, it was held that their evidence was not conclusive and other persons present could be called to prove that they were mistaken[23].

In a case where the attesting witness of a mortgage deed was not examined on the ground that he was won over by the opposite party, it was held that it was not sufficient for consideration of other evidence to prove execution.[24]

Where the law does not require attestation, for the validity of a document, it may be proved by admission or otherwise, as though no attesting witnesses existed.

Section 67, states that, if a document is alleged to be signed or to have been written, the signature or the handwriting on the document must be proved to be in his handwriting. If that is done the document would be taken to have been proved under Section 67. Even a document, which is attested but is not required by law to be attested can be proved without reference to Section 67.

No attesting witness need be examined with reference to a document like a sale deed, as it does not require attestation.[25] A bond also, is not required by law to be attested. So Section 72 applies and Section 68 does not apply.[26]

By virtue of Section 129 of the Transfer of Property Act, Section 68 of Evidence Act is not applicable to a gift made by a Mohammadan in compliance with the provisions of Mohammadan Law. Even if the gift is created by a registered deed, it can be proved without examining the attesting witness under Section 72 of the Evidence Act.[27]

In PHIPSON on Evidence[28] it is stated that the rule embodied in Section 72 and applies only where all the parties are before the court, and that in proceedings ex parte the attesting witness must still be called.[29]

Comparison of signature, writing or seal with others admitted or proved.

S. 73. In order to ascertain whether a signature, writing or seal is that of the person by whom it purports to have been written or made, any signature, writing or seal admitted or proved to the satisfaction of the Court to have been written or made by that person may be compared with the one which is to be proved, although that signature, writing or seal has not been produced or proved for any other purpose.

The Court may direct any person present in Court to write any words or figures for the purpose of enabling the Court to compare the words or figures so written with any words or figures alleged to have been written by such person.

This section applies also, with any necessary modifications, to finger impressions.

writings or seals which have been admitted or proved to the satisfaction of the Court to have been made or written by that person. A Court may rely upon its own comparison of the signature, writing, or seal, unaided by expert evidence.[31] The rule of prudence is that comparison of signatures by Courts as a mode of ascertaining the truth should be used with great care and caution.[32] This section does not infringe Art. 20(3) of the Constitution of India.[33]

Handwriting can be proved in the following ways:—

(1) By proof of signature and handwriting of the person alleged to have signed or written the document (S. 67).

(2) By the opinion of an expert who can compare handwritings (S. 45).

(3) By a witness who is acquainted with the handwriting of a person by whom it is supposed to have been written and signed (S. 47).

(4) By comparison of signature, writing or seal with others admitted or proved (S. 73).

The writing obtained by the court under this section does not come within the expression 'evidence'.[34]

This section is based on the principles of English Law now in force which was adopted from the practice in the old eclesiastical courts with some modifications in about 1854. The Supreme Court in State (Delhi Admn.) v. Pali Ram[35], quoted with approval, TAYLOR ON EVIDENCE[36], the passage in which it was observed: "Comparison of a disputed writing with any writing proved to the satisfaction of a judge to be genuine, shall be permitted to be made by the witness; and such writings and the evidence of the witnesses respecting the same, may be submitted to the Court and jury as evidence of the genuiness or otherwise of the writing in dispute".

The Supreme Court further observed: "The first part of the section provides for the comparison of signature, writing, finger impression etc., purporting to have been written or made by a person with another admitted or proved to the satisfaction of the Court to have been written or made by the same person. But it does not say by whom such comparison may be made. Construed in the light of the English Law on the subject, which is the legislative source of this provision, it is clear that such comparison may be made by a handwriting expert (Section 45) or by one familiar with the handwriting of the person concerned (Section 47) or by the Court".

The direct comparison by the court is contemplated under this section as an alternative method. For that purpose, the court is given the power to direct any person present in court to write any words or figures, for enabling the court to compare them with the words or figures alleged to have been made by such person. It is only a discretionary and enabling power as the expression "may direct" is used. When the court directs, if the person refuses to comply with it, adverse inference under Section 114 of the Act may be drawn.

This section applies to both civil and criminal proceedings.

In a proceeding for maintenance under Section 125, Cr PC., the husband denied a letter by him bearing on the question of marriage. It was held that the court has discretion to ask the husband under Section 73 of the act to give specimen signature for purpose of comparison by an expart.[37]

The Supreme Court in State (Delhi Admn.) v. Pali Ram[38] observed: "The two paragraphs in the section are complimentary to each other and are not mutually exclusive. Section 73 is, therefore, to be read as a whole, in the light of Section 45, and so it is clear that a court can direct an accused, appearing before it, to give his sample writing to be compared by a handwriting expert chosen or approved by the court, irrespective of whether his name was suggested by the prosecution or the defence, to enable the court to reach its own conclusion with the assistance of the expert".

Section 73 as a whole makes it clear in the light of Section 45 and 47, that the court does not exceed its power under Section 73, if in the interest of the justice, it directs a person appearing before it, whether it is a civil or criminal court, to give sample writing to enable the same to be compared by a handwriting expert.[39]

For the application of the section, two conditions are to be satisfied. Firstly, the writing with which comparison is to be made, or otherwise called standard writing, should be one either admitted by the person alleged to have made the writing, or should be proved to have been written by the person to whom it is attributed. Secondly, the writing to be compared with the standard one must be shown to have been written by the same person, i.e., the writing itself must state or indicate that it was written by that person.[40]

The ordinary methods of proving the handwriting are (1) by calling the person who wrote the document, or saw it written as a witness, or a person who is qualified to express an opinion according to Section 47; (2) by a comparison of handwriting under Section 73; and (3) by admission of the person against whom it was tendered.[41]

Under Sections 45 and 73, the court is empowered to direct any party to give specimen signature or handwriting, with a view to getting the same compared with the disputed one, or for sending it to a handwriting expert.[42]

There is no legal bar to the judge using his own eyes to compare the disputed writing with the admitted writing under Section 73. However, the opinion of the court arrived at is not conclusive and is liable to error. So the court as a matter of prudence and caution should hesitate or be slow to arrive its findings solely on the comparison made by itself.[43]

To decide very vital claims of parties the judge should not compare the disputed handwritings with admitted handwriting so as to ascertain whether they are in the handwriting of one and the same person.[44]

This section deals with comparison of signature, handwriting, or seal of a person purporting to have been written or made by such person, with admitted or proved signature of that person. This section also applies with necessary modifications, to finger print impressions.

The section thus provides one of the modes of proving the handwriting or the signature on a document. Section 45 provides another mode of proof as to the identity of handwriting or signature, with the aid of experts, whereas Section 47 enables proof of the handwriting or signatures of a person viz., by examining any person acquainted with such handwriting or signature.

The mode of proof contemplated by Section 73 is by direct comparison of the disputed signature or handwriting with the one which is admittedly genuine or proved to be so. The second para of Section 73 enables the court to direct any person present in the court to write any words or figures for the purpose of enabling the court to compare the words and figures so written with any words, figures alleged to have been written by such person. But the use of the expression "may direct", in the second paragraph of Section 73 would indicate that the section is only an enabling provision. This does not mean that the court can compel the person to give specimen handwriting or signature under the section.

The Magistrate has no power to ask an accused person, who is on bail, to go to a police station and give his specimen signature or handwriting; the powers of the magistrate and police officer are prescribed under some statutes and those powers cannot be enlarged. There is no provision for the exercise by them of a power under Section 73.[45]

As the definition of "Sign" in Section 3(56) General Clauses Act, includes a thumb impression, as Section 73 permitting comparison of signature, writing and seal is intended to be quite comprehensive, on a liberal interpretation, the presiding officer can compare thumb impressions for the purpose of determining the identity or otherwise of the thumb impressions, or at any rate for appreciating the evidence of experts.[46]

The court can compare the disputed writing of a person with other writings, either admitted to be his by that person or proved to be of that person.[47]

Where the Magistrate compared a disputed signature with another signature which was not admitted by the accused or was not proved to be that of the accused it was held that the finding of the magistrate was based absolutely on no legal evidence.[48]

Specimen signatures and writings made by an accused person while he is in the custody of the police and while the police are investigating the offence are admissible in evidence at the trial of the accused for the offence of forgery.[49]

It was held in the case of letters containing the disputed signature of a person G that the court is entitled to compare it with the signature of G on a postal acknowledgement cards where the court was satisfied that the postal acknowledgement cards contained the signatures of G.[50]

2. OBJECT NOT TO ASSIST PARTIES

The power cannot be used as an instrument or a device for the advantage of any party, either the prosecution or the accused; the object of the provision is to enable the court to find out the truth and to do complete justice between the parties. This section enables the court to assist itself and not to assist the parties.[51] Where the specimen of handwriting were obtained under the directions of the SDM who was neither conducting the enquiry nor was the trial fixed before him and there was no evidence of the accused giving the specimen voluntarily, it was held that, in the circumstances, specimen were not meant to assist the "Court to form its opinion" as envisaged by Section 45.[52]

3. TO BE EXERCISED WITH CARE AND CAUTION

Section 73 enables the court to do the comparison. Comparison requires some special skill acquired after a regular course of study; that it is not possible for every presiding officer of the court to have obtained expert skill in that regard; it has the effect of making the court itself a witness, who cannot be a cross-examined, though an expert, if he gives evidence, can be cross-examined. But these factors cannot restrict the exercise of the power of the court. The way of reconciling the enabling the provisions of the statute with these factors is only the principle of prudence and caution. Though the court is competent under law to make a comparison, it should exercise the power very sparingly and with utmost caution.[53]

The Court is entitled to compare the disputed and admitted signatures and handwriting for coming to a conclusion but the rule of prudence and caution requires that in the first place the expert's opinion should be obtained for assistance and if such an opinion is not available, the presiding judge must disclose in the judgment his knowledge in the subject of comparison of hand writing or should mention that he has taken aid from some authoritative text book. The Court should also mention whether the result of its comparison finds support from some evidence adduced by the parties in the shape of oral or documentary evidence or direct evidence. Mere statement in the judgment that on comparison the disputed and admitted signatures are found to be of the same person is not enough and it cannot be said to be a sound finding based on cogent and scientific reasons and data.[54]

4. HOW TO BE COMPARED

For the purpose of comparison the true test to be applied, is to consider the general character of the two writings, sought to be compared, and not to lose oneself in scrutinising the formation of each individual letter. It is not uncommon to find differences in the writing of one and the same person, even after a short interval of time. It depends upon so many extraneous circumstances, the pen, the ink, the paper, the posture of the hand and the general conditions in which a person writes. It is for that reason that the law merely requires consideration of the general character of the two handwritings.[55]

In examining the documents the court has to see the dissimilarities between the disputed and genuine document because forged documents usually are good imitations of genuine documents.[56]

In the absence of marked differences between the two signatures, the court would not be justified in rejecting the disputed signatures as not genuine.[57] Personal characteristics of the writer are the unfailing guides in determining the genuineness of handwriting.[58]

5. HAZARDOUS AND INCONCLUSIVE

A direction to an accused under Section 73 is not tantamount to his examination under the Cr. P.C., or to making an order to the prejudice of the accused under Section 439, Cr. P.C.[59]

The conclusions based on mere comparison of handwriting must, at best, be indecisive and yield to the positive evidence in the case.[60]

It is unsatisfactory and dangerous in any event, to stake a decision in the case on a comparison of handwriting.[61]

LORD ATKIN observed; "But their Lordships have also themselves carefully compared the endorsement with the admitted signatures, and they are unable to feel the certainty which was expressed by the Chief Justice. The signatures appear to be written with different ink and possibility at different times, and though the purported signature bears a close resemblance to some of the genuine examples produced notably to a signature in a letter of authority addressed to Jethabhai himself, the purported signature of Keshvalal himself is by no means convincing".[62]

It should not be taken that the above observation prohibits comparison by the court. Even the Privy Council compared the handwritings as there was no expert evidence adduced in that case. MADHAVAN

NAIR J. observed at P. 329 "after carefully examining the various signatures, their Lordships are not satisfied that the disputed signature is that of the deceased".[63]

The Supreme Court compared the various admitted signatures and the writings of the testators at different times, to decide about the genuineness of the signatures in a will, and held that it was genuine.[64]

Their Lordships were strongly impressed by the comparison of the disputed signature with the admittedly genuine signature.[65]

A comparison of handwriting as a mode of proof is at all times hazardous and inconclusive and especially when it is made by any one not conversant with the subject and without guidance from expert evidence.[66]

6. WHEN COMPARISON UNNECESSARY

When oral evidence clearly establishes that a person executed a certain document, it is unnecessary for the Court to embark upon an investigation into the signatures by comparison.[67]

Where there is no evidence on the question of genuineness of the disputed signature, either direct or circumstantial, or the opinions of experts or of persons acquainted with such handwriting or signature (under Section 45 or 47 of the Evidence Act), the Court's own opinion arrived at as a result of comparison authorised by Section 73 would not be adequate for resting its finding.[68]

7. COMPARISON OF HANDWRITING BY THE COURT

This section enables the court to compare the handwritings with the sole object of ascertaining whether the signature which is disputed is genuine or not. The court is given the power to direct any person present in the court to give specimen handwriting or signature, for the purpose of comparison with the disputed one. But where in a case of enforcement of bank guarantee, the guarantor took the plea that the signatures on the deed were forged and for comparison of signatures the admitted signatures of the guarantor on acknowledgement, summon etc. were available before the Court, further getting his another signature in the open Court for comparison was not necessary.[69] The Court cannot compare the signatures and base its findings on it. However, it can compare signatures in order to strengthen its findings based on other cogent evidence or material on record.[70] Comparison of signatures by the Court and its conclusion thereon would not prevail over the cogent, consistent and convincing oral testimony.[71]

It was held that the judge should as a matter of prudence and caution, hesitate to base his finding solely on the comparison made by him; that the prudent course would be to obtain opinion or assistance of an expert.[72] Where the entire case of the plaintiff was based on the deed of agreement for sale of a disputed house in respect of which the defendant contended to be forged and fabricated, the Court should not have rejected the application for sending the disputed signature for examination to handwriting expert.[73] In several cases it has been held the power to compare the documents should be done with great care and caution.[74] Comparison of disputed signatures by the High Court without the aid of the expert or the person conversant with the disputed signatures is illegal[75] but the Court is competent to draw the comparison on the basis of admitted signatures.[76] However, the Madras High Court has held that it is not always necessary that the expert should invariably be examined and his opinion alone must be taken into account for comparing the disputed signature.[77]

"See cases under the head, to be exercised with care and cautions".

When handwriting expert said the thumb impression was not that of a person the court cannot substitute its opinion.[78]

8. COMPARISON BY APPELLATE COURTS AND IN REVISION

The Appellate Court is entitled under Section 73 to compare the signatures and come to its own conclusion, where the identity of signatures was in issue before the trial court.[79] The Supreme Court held that in an appeal the court is entitled to call for the writing for making a comparison thereof.[80] The trial Court can also do it.[81]

Determining the genuineness of the signature on the document by comparing it with proved signature cannot be done in revision, as it amounts to bringing in new evidence.[82]

When the court compares handwriting unaided by expert evidence, it should be before lawyers and with their assistance.[83] Where the court rejects the evidence of the experts on both sides, it should not convert itself into a handwriting expert, and stake a decision on the correct determination of the genuineness of the signature. The conclusions based on mere comparison are at best indecisive and must yield to the positive evidence in the case.[84] A court will not be justified in relying mainly upon its own impressions by comparison of the disputed signature with the admitted signature but should consider the entire evidence in the case.[85] The dispute regarding genuineness of a signature should not be decided by the Court merely on the basis of its personal comparison.[86] When the opposite party has refused to examine the expert, the court can examine the disputed handwriting with the admitted one.[87] The comparison of signatures by a court is not and should not be dependant on the examination of a handwriting expert.[88] This section does not prohibit this sending of handwriting given by a person in court to a handwriting expert for his opinion.[89] The court is not bound to refer to a handwriting expert when by itself it could note dissmiliarity in the signature and handwriting.[90] There is no rule of law that the court is precluded from coming to its own conclusion in cases where it is fully familiar with the language and script of the document which is the subject matter of scrutiny before it and where it has the assistance in such scrutiny of the counsel of the parties. When it comes to its own conclusion by comparison, it is not bound to seek the assistance of the handwriting expert. It may be a rule of caution and prudence that, where the court considers that the opinion of a handwriting expert would be of assistance to it in coming to a decision, it may call for the evidence of an expert.[91]

91. Bhaggu v. Manni Prasad, AIR 1965 All 202.

Section 73 is quite general in its terms and applies to all cases; if there is nothing in the criminal procedure code which precludes its application to criminal trials. There is no reason why the plain language of the section should not be given its full effect. Section 342, Cr.P.C., does not make Section 73 of the Evidence Act inapplicable to criminal trials. When an impression is taken under the provisions of the Identification of Prisoner Act (1920), it is in strict compliance with Section 73.[1]

Under Sections 4 & 5 of the Identification of Prisoners Act, the accused can be compelled to give his measurements; the word "measurements" as defined in Section 2(a) of that Act does not include "specimen handwriting". It was held that accused cannot be compelled to give specimen handwriting under Sections 4 & 5 though it has power under Section 73 of this Act to direct the accused to give finger impressions as well as specimen writing.[2]

Where the evidence of the handwriting expert was not corroborated, it was held that the Court can furnish corroboration by comparing the handwriting and come to the conclusion.[3]

The comparison a court makes is only to assist it in arriving at the conclusion whether the evidence led on one side or the other is acceptable.[4]

A comparison of the disputed with the admitted writings, is a piece of evidence on record and it is a method of examining the internal evidence of a document and of judging whether it finds support from other evidence which is external qua the document containing the disputed writing. Another method is to look for other kinds of circumstantial or direct corroborative evidence on record.[5]

Plaintiff is not bound to examine a handwriting expert to prove his case, whenever the defendant denies his signature, nor is the court bound to accept the evidence of an expert produced by the defendant as true.[6]

According to the Bombay High Court the expression by whom it purports to have been written or made means by whom it is alleged to have been written or made[7]. The Calcutta High Court has construed it to mean that the writing which is in dispute must itself in terms express or indicate that it was written by the person to whom the writing is attributed. It has observed that the section "does not sanction the comparison of any two documents, but requires that the writing with which the comparison is to be made.... shall be admitted or proved to have been written by the person to whom it is attributed, and next the writing to be compared with the standard...must purport to have been written by the same person, that is to say, the writing itself must state or indicate that it was written by that person...a comparison of handwriting is at all times as a mode of proof hazardous and inconclusive, and especially when it is made by one not conversant with the subject and without such guidance as might be derived from the arguments of counsel and the evidence of experts"[8].

According to the Bombay view when an anonymous writing is produced and ascribed by the prosecution to a particular person, the case for the prosecution must be taken to be that having regard to the admitted documents and the comparison between them and the disputed writing, the prosecution alleges that the disputed document purports to have been written or made by the accused.[9]

The Madras High Court dissenting from Barindra v. R.[10] and approving R. v. Ganpat Balkrishna.[11] held that the word "purports" does not limit the scope to such documents only as are signed or contain some intrinsic statements of identity of the writer; any document alleged by a party to be in the handwriting of a particular person may, for the purpose of proof, be compared with other writing or signature admitted or proved.[12]

This view seems to be correct as it is not always possible to have a statement in the document disclosing or indicating the identity of the writer.

Section 73 is in part materia with Section 540, Cr. P.C. If a party files a petition under Section 540, Cr. P.C., that does not obliterate the power of the court to summon a witness as a court witness. On the same analogy, filing of a petition by the complainant for taking action under Section 73 Evidence Act does not take away the statutory power of the court to act according to Section 540.[13]

The court cannot hand over the specimen handwriting taken in the court, to the prosecution, for use and opinion of the handwriting expert.[14]

The Court also cannot send such a document to an expert who is a prosecution witness, but it can call its own expert as a Court-witness.[15]

The Supreme Court in State of Delhi Administration v. Pali Ram[16] reversing the decision in 1975 Cr LJ. 1736 (Delhi) held that the two paragraphs of Section 73 are not mutually exclusive but are complementary to each other; Section 73 is therefore to be read as a whole in the light of Section 45. A court holding an enquiry under the Criminal Procedure Code in respect of an offence triable by itself or by the Court of sessions does not exceed its powers under Section 73, if, in the interest of justice, it directs an accused person appearing before it to give his sample writing, to enable the same to be compared by a handwriting expert chosen or approved by the court, irrespective of whether his name was suggested by the prosecution or the defence, because even in adopting this course, the purpose is to enable the court before which he is ultimately put up for trial to compare the disputed writing with his (accused) admitted writing and to reach its own conclusion with the assistance of the experts. It is not advisable that the Judge should take upon himself the task of comparing the admitted writing with the disputed one to find out whether the two agree with each other; and the prudent course is to obtain the opinion and assistance of an expert.[17]

The court can direct a person to appear in court and give specimen of his handwriting. The power can be exercised suo motu or on application of a party.[18]

9. "ANY PERSON"

The words "any person" in Section 73, para 2 are wide enough to cover an accused person.[19]

The words "any person" are so wide as to include all persons; the words "person present in court" limits only those persons who are before the court and may not include an on looker or a spectator but refers to persons who are parties to the "cause" pending before the court. It may include even the witnesses of the contesting parties in the said cause.[20]

It was held that the direction to the son of the defendant who was present in court, to give his handwriting, was unquestionable, as the son's interest was represented by his father as a defendant in the suit, and that a stranger must also come within the sweep of Section 73, so that the object of the section may not be defeated.[21]

The Gujarat High Court held that under Rule 78 of the Civil Manual (Gujarat) Vol. I. Chap. VII, there is no provision enabling the court to take writings of a party or a witness in the presence of the court, with a view to supplying the standard writing for comparison with the disputed writing.[22]

10. CONSTITUTIONAL VALIDITY [SECTION 73]

The principle enshrined in Art. 20(3) of the Constitution is known as testimonial compulsion. In Sharma v. Satish,[23] the Supreme Court observed that a direction to the accused to give specimen writing or finger impression or the issue of any compulsory process for the production of any document which is reasonably likely to support the prosecution case infringed Art 20(3) of the Constitution. It was a case of seizure of some documents from the premises under a search warrant and it was held that the seizure was not unconstitutional, under Art 20(3) of the Constitution. The above observation of the Supreme Court was held obiter in a later case before the Supreme Court in Md. Dastagir v. State of Madras[24] and reiterated in another Supreme Court case, State of Madras v. Kathi Kalu.[25]

Several High Courts followed the Supreme Court decision in Sharma v. Satish.[26]

It has been held in some cases that mere direction by a Court to give specimen handwriting or finger impression does not violate Art. 20(3) of the Constitution, as it does not amount to "compulsion" or testimonial compulsion, and as the person to whom it is directed may still refuse to comply in which case adverse inference may be drawn under Section 114 of the Evidence Act.[27]

The Supreme Court held:[28] (a) 'To be a witness' is not equivalent to 'furnishing evidence' in its widest significance; that is to say, as including not merely making of oral or written statements but also production of documents or giving materials which may be relevant at a trial to determine the guilt or innocence of the accused.

(b) Giving thumb impressions or impressions of foot or palm or fingers or specimen writings or showing parts of the body by way of identification are not included in the expression 'to be a witness'.

(c) 'To be a witness' means imparting knowledge in respect of relevant facts by an oral statement or a statement in writing, made or given in Court or otherwise.

(d) 'To be a witness' in its ordinary grammatical sense means giving oral testimony in Court. Case law has gone beyond this strict literal interpretation of the expression which may now bear a wider meaning, namely, bearing testimony in Court or out of Court by a person accused of an offence, orally or in writing.[29]

Three judges however expressed a different view in regard to the proposition (c) above. Delivering the judgment on their behalf DAS GUPTA J. said: "That brings us to the suggestion that the expression "to be a witness" must be limited to a statement whether oral or in writing by an accused person imparting knowledge of relevant facts; but that mere production of some material evidence, whether documentary or otherwise would not come within the ambit of this expression. This suggestion has found favour with the majority of the Bench; we think however that this is an unduly narrow interpretation. We have to remind ourselves that while on the one hand we should bear in mind that the Constitution-makers could not have intended to stifle legitimate modes of investigation. We have to remember further that quite clearly they thought that certain things should not be allowed to be done, during the investigation, or trial, however helpful they might seem to be to the unfolding of truth and an unnecessary apprehension of disaster to the police system and the administration of justice, should not deter us from giving the words their proper meaning. It appears to us that to limit the meaning of the words "to be a witness" in Art. 20(3) in the manner suggested would result in allowing compulsion to be used in procuring the production from the accused of a large number of documents, which are of evidentiary value, sometimes even more so than any oral statement of a witness might be. Suppose, for example, an accused person has in his possession, a letter written to him by an alleged co-conspirator in reference to their common intention in connection with the conspiracy for committing a particular offence. Under S. 10 of the Evidence Act this document is a relevant fact as against the accused himself for the purpose of proving the existence of the conspiracy and also for the purpose of shwoing that any such person was a party to it. By producing this, the accused will not be imparting any personal knowledge of facts; yet it would certainly be giving evidence of a relevant fact. Again, the possession by an accused of the plan of a house where burglary has taken place would be a relevant fact under S. 8 of the Evidence Act as showing preparation for committing theft. By producing this plan is he not giving evidence against himself ?[30]

Though in proposition by the majority observed that giving specimen writing is not included in the expression to be a witness, the minority observed that an accused would be furnishing evidence, when he is giving his specimen handwriting. But he cannot be said to have been compelled to be a witness against himself within the meaning of Art 20(3). They observed: "But the evidence of specimen handwriting or the impressions of the accused person's fingers, palm or foot, will incriminate him, only if on comparison of these with certain other handwritings or certain other impressions, identity between the two sets is established. By themselves, these impressions or the handwritings do not incriminate the accused person, or even tend to do so. That is why it must be held that by giving these impressions or specimen handwriting, the accused person does not furnish evidence against himself. So when an accused person is compelled to give a specimen handwriting or impressions of his finger, palm or foot, it may be said that he has been compelled to be a witness; it cannot however be said that he has been compelled to be a witness against himself.[31]

On this reasoning they agreed with the majority that there is no infringement of Art. 20(3) of the Constitution by compelling an accused person to give his specimen handwriting or signature or his impressions of his fingers, palm or foot by the court for purpose of comparison under Section 73.

It is to be noted here that when an accused is called upon to do an act i.e., to give impression of the finger or own handwriting, and if he does it, then it would involve necessarily his volition to do that act which in the language of the Supreme Court amounts to personal testimony. Of course, if he refuses to comply, then he cannot be compelled in any manner and then the only course the court may adopt is to draw an adverse inference under Section 114. If the accused does not raise any objection, he shall be deemed to have complied with the direction voluntarily and not under any compulsion.[32] A person required by the court to give a specimen may refuse to do so. There is no element of compulsion in it. The only consequence of non-compliance is that the Court is free to draw on adverse presumption under S. 114.[33] If he refuses to comply with the direction of the Court, and if the thumb impression is taken in spite of his protests, the Court may draw adverse presumption against him.[34]

11. WHETHER DIRECTION CAN BE GIVEN DURING INVESTIGATION

The Supreme Court has left open the question whether a magistrate can direct the accused to give specimen handwriting during the course of investigation, without giving any definite pronouncement.[35]

The Supreme Court in State of U.P. v. Ram Babu Misra,[36] while over-ruling[37]; Gulzar Khan v. State and[38] B. Ramreddy v. State of A.P. and explaining the earlier decision of the Supreme Court in State of Bombay v. Kathi Kalu[39] observed "though a direction by the magistrate to the accused to give his specimen writing when the case is still under investigation would surely be in the interest of administration of justice, the language of Section 73 of the Evidence Act does not enable the magistrate to give such a direction when the case is still under investigation. The section contemplates pendency of some proceedings before a court. It does not permit a court to give a direction to the accused to give specimen writings for anticipated necessity of comparison in a proceeding which may later be instituted. Further Section 73 makes no distinction between a civil court and a criminal court.[40] The power under this section can be exercised only when an enquiry or trial is pending before the Court.[41]

It has been held that direction to a person to give his thumb impression during investigation is permissible under Section 73.[42]

A Sub-Divisional Magistrate lodging a complaint of an offence, cannot issue a direction to the accused under Section 73 as he is in the position of a prosecutor.[43]

12. FOOTMARKS

In order to secure evidentiary value to documents it is not enough to show that the footmarks tally with the shoes of the accused. The evidence must go further and show that the marks have some peculiarity which is found in the shoes of the accused and will not be found in most other shoes.[44] The Court cannot be told not to exercise the power under the section only because it is hazardous to do so. The court is not thereby assuming the role of an expert.[45]

COMMENTS

1. PRINCIPLE AND SCOPE

Documents are divided into two categories: public and private.

Section 74 states what is within the category of public documents. Section 75 states that all other documents are private.

Certain modes of proof are prescribed in regard to public documents as distinguished from private documents.

Sections 74-78 deal with (a) the nature of public documents, and (b) the proof which is to be given to them. Section 74 defines their nature; and Sections 76-78 deal with the exceptional mode of proof applicable in their case. The proof of private documents is subject to the general provisions of the Act relating to the proof of documentary evidence contained in Sections 71-73.

48. Substituted by AO 1950.

"There are several exceptions to the rule which requires primary evidence to be given. The most important and conspicuous exception, however, is with respect to the proof of records, and other public documents of general concern; the objection to producing which rests on the ground of moral, not physical inconvenience. They are, comparatively speaking, not liable to correction, alteration, or misrepresentation the whole community being interested in their preservation, and, in most instances, entitled to inspect them; while private writings, on the contrary, are the objects of interest but to few, whose property they are, and the inspection of them can only be obtained, if at all, by application to a Court of justice. The number of persons interested in public documents also renders them much more frequently required for evidentiary purposes; and if the production of the originals were insisted on, not only would great inconvenience result from the same documents being wanted in different places at the same time, but the continual change of place would expose them to be lost, and the handling from frequent use would soon ensure their destruction. For these and other reasons the law deems it better to allow their contents to be proved by derivative evidence, and to run the chance, whatever that may be, of errors arising from inaccurate transcription, either intentional or casual. But, true to its great principle of exacting the best evidence that the nature of the matter affords, the law requires this derivative evidence to be of a very trustworthy kind, and has defined, with much precision, the forms of it which may be resorted to in proof of the different sorts of public writings"[49].

In TAYLOR ON EVIDENCE[50] it is stated "Public writings consist of the acts of public functionaries in the Executive, Legislative and Judicial departments of government. Under the head of public documents come also the transactions which the official persons are required to enter in books or registers, in the course of their public duties, and which occur within the circle of their own personal knowledge and observation. Foreign acts of State, and the Judgments of Foreign Courts also belong to the class of public document".

In HALSBURY'S LAWS OF ENGLAND, 4th Edn., Vol. 17, para, 163, it is observed that: "To render such a document admissible there must have been a judicial or quasi-judicial duty to inquire, undertaken by a public officer, the matter must have been required to be ascertained for a public purpose, and the document must have been made for the purpose of the public making use of it and being able to refer to it.

"The public" in this context does not mean the whole world, but all persons concerned, for instance all persons interested in a manor in the case of an entry in the books of a manor.[51]

The limits within which such documents are admissible are laid down by LORD BLACKBURN in Sturla v. Freccia.[52] The document must be brought into existence for the purpose of its being retained indefinitely as a document of record available for inspection by the public.[53]

Where the question arose as to the admissibility of a statement regarding age and place of birth of an individual, contained in a report appointed by a foreign government to know the individual's fitness to hold a post under that government, the House of Lords in Sturla v. Freccia[54], rejected the evidence afforded by that report. LORD BLACKBURN stated that the document was not (1) made under a duty to enquire into the circumstances recorded. (2) concerned with a public matter. (3) intended to be retained permanently, and (4) meant for public inspection.

FARWELL J., observed: "The test of publicity as put by LORD BLACKBURN, is that the public are interested in it and entitled to see it, so that if there is anything wrong in it they would be entitled to protest. In that sense, it becomes a statement that would be open to the public to challenge or dispute, and therefore it has a certain amount of authority. The whole gist of the rule as to public documents is that the publicity must be contemporaneous, and publicity means such publicity as would afford the opportunity of correcting anything that is wrong".[55]

This section deals with two sets of documents; the first set is covered by Cl. 1. They are:—documents forming the acts or records of the acts—(1) of the sovereign authority (2) of official bodies and tribunals, (3) of public officers, legislative, judicial and executive, of any part of India or of the Commonwealth or of a Foreign Country.

The second set of documents are given in Cl. 2 viz., public records kept in any State of private documents. The rest of the documents, other than those noted above, would be private documents, as can be seen from Section 75 of the Act.

2. "PUBLIC DOCUMENT"

WIGMORE[56] has observed: "The term "public document" is inadequate and misleading. In the first place, the word "public" is ambiguous. It may signify "open to all", capable of being known or observed by all; or it may signify "having an interest for persons in general"; or it may signify "made or done by an officer of the Government". These are decidedly different senses. So far as the term may indicate a general principle, it is obvious that the principle may result in different rules according to the sense in which the word "public", is to be interpreted.

A public document is one prepared by a public servant in the discharge of his official duties. All the public documents have this characteristic that they are kept in some special custody and are provable by means of a copy without production of original.[57]

A private document does not become a public document simply because it is filed in the court. To be a public document, it should be record of the act of a public officer or of a court, that a part of the document, namely, the original part would be a private document forming the record of the act of the private parties, and what is subsequently added to that document by the court would be a public document.[58] Similarly, a declaration made by a private party before a public authority and bearing the seal of that authority, would not make it a public document.[59]

Once a document is held to be a public document and it is properly proved as required by Section 78, the presumption in respect of the public document would apply irrespective of the fact whether those public documents are of British India or of a foreign state.[60]

A question arose whether a statement recorded under Section 164, Cr.P.C., during investigation is a public document and whether the accused has got a right to inspect it and obtain a certified copy of it. The Madras High Court, after reviewing the case law, observed (1) the statements recorded under Section 164, Cr.P.C., would be public documents falling under Section 74, Cl. (1) (iii) of the evidence Act. (2) the accused will be entitled to copies of the same as a person interested. (3) but his right to obtain such copies before the filing of the charge sheet has been taken away by implication, by the provisions of Section 173 of the Cr.P.C., and (4) he will be entitled to the copies of the documents only if on charge sheet is filed.[61]

The Madras High Court has held that the accused had no right to inspect or obtain certified copies of statements or confessions recorded under Section 164, Cr.P.C. before the charge sheet was filed.[62]

In the Calcutta case[63] the court had to deal with a statement recorded during investigation by the Excise Officer under the Bengal Excise Act. It was observed that Section 173(4) was not made applicable by Section 74 of the West Bengal Excise Act though Sections 160 to 171 of Cr.P.C. were made applicable.

It was held by the Supreme Court that the discovery and arrest of the accused being one of the essential steps in the course of investigation, the confessional statement may be taken to have been recorded during the course of investigation within the meaning of Section 164, Cr.P.C., but as the recording magistrate was a second class Magistrate not specifically empowered in that behalf, the record is inadmissible in evidence at the trial. Even under Section 74 it cannot be treated as a public document and admissible under Section 80 of this Act.[64]

Merely production of a document kept in police custody will not be a proof of it as a public document. Unless the officer who recorded the statement is called for and examined, those documents cannot be said to be proved, particularly when the person who recorded the statement was very much alive.[65]

4. DOCUMENTS FORMING THE ACTS OR RECORD OF THE ACTS

A check memo which is required to be maintained by the officer in charge of the counting table is a document forming record of the acts of a public officer, and therefore a certified copy given by the collector in whose custody the document is kept, can be admitted in evidence in proof of the contents of the original document.[66] The word "acts" in the phrase "documents forming the acts or records of the acts" is used in one and the same sense. The act of which the record made is a public document must be similar in kind to the act which takes shape of form in a public document. The kind of acts which Section 74 has in view is indicated by Section 78. The acts there mentioned are all final completed acts as distinguished from acts of a preparatory or tentative character. The inquiries which a public officer may make whether under the Criminal Procedure Code or otherwise may or may not result in action. There may be no publicity about them. There is a substantial distinction between such measures and the specific act in which they may result. It is to the latter only that Section 74 was intended to refer.[67]

A document which is brought into existance as a result of a survey, inquiry or inquisition carried out or held under lawful authority is not admissible in evidence as a public document unless the inquiry was a judicial or quasi-judicial inquiry and the document is not only available for public inspection but was brought into existance for that very purpose. The statements in a document tendered in evidence as a public document should be statements with regard to matters which it was the duty of the public officer building the inquiry to inquire into and report on.[68]

TAYLOR ON EVIDENCE[69] states: The records of courts of justice and other judicial writing also constitute public documents. Amongst the above class of documents come the records of the old superior courts of law and equity and the Quasi Records of those courts. The expression "Quasi records" embraces the following:—

(1) Depositions (2) Affidavits (3) Bills (4) Answers (5) Orders (6) Decrees and (7) Rules of the Court (8) and certain other documents, which, though not strictly records, partake so much of their nature that they can be proved by means of copies to the same extent as records and are subject generally to the same rule of evidence.

The Madras High Court has held that it is unwarranted to place restrictions on the words "document forming the acts or the records of the acts" and to say that they should be confined to those parts of the Income-tax records which the Income Tax Officer had himself prepared, and to exclude the documents which he had himself called for e.g., record returns, profits and loss statements, etc., or which has been admitted to the record for the purpose of assessment.[70]

An endorsement of a Magistrate on a complaint and the order sheet in the case transferring the same to another Megistrate for disposal is admissible under Section 74 as a being the act of the judicial officer. Similarly, the copy of the order sheet in the case is admissible as it is the act of the court.[71] The records of acts of public tribunals are public records which the parties to the adjudication are entitled to inspect and obtain their certified copies.[72] Documents forming acts, or record of acts, of police and the magistrate exercising the power under Cr.P.C. are public documents.[73]

Where there were two documents of two different public schools, showing same age of a child and were in existence anti litem motem, it was held that there could be no ground to doubt the genuineness of the document and it can be treated as evidence, but Section 74 would be irrelevant.[74]

Distinction between Record of the Court and Record of Act of the Court:

There is a distinction between the record of the court of and the record of the act of the court. It is only the record of the act of the court which is a public document, therefore a compromise petition filed by the parties before a court is not a public document. So also the pleadings of the parties before the court, are not public documents. But orders or decrees passed by the courts are public documents as they are the record of the acts of the court.

The following are public documents:

The judgment of a court.[75]

A certified copy of a decree of court.[76]

Certified copy of an order of the probate court with a copy of the will annexed.[77]

A certified copy of a registered private sale-deed.[78]

A statement of a witness in a Criminal Court.[79]

The records of acts of public tribunals.[80]

Notes of evidence recorded by a court of small causes.[81]

A written order for the issue of a search warrant by a magistrate, or court.[82]

A warrant issued by a court.[83]

A report submitted by police officer for granting remand of the accused or for retention of remand.[84]

The F.I.R. filed in the court.[85]

Statements of witnesses recorded by a public officer who is authorised to record such statement.[86]

A charge sheet filed by the police against an accused.[87]

A school master comes within the purview of executive officer and a copy of a certificate given by him is admissible in evidence if properly certified.[88]

Notifications issued by the Central or State Governments or by a department of any state government.[89]

The following are not Public documents:

It has been held that the documents which consist of plaint, written statement, affidavits and petitions filed in a Court cannot be said to form such acts or records of acts as are mentioned in the section, and so they are not public documents.[44]

However The Madras High Court has held that plaints and written statements are public documents.[45] It is submitted that this view is probable as it accords with the view expressed by TAYLOR[46] and of BEST[47]. If plaints and other documents filed by the parties in Courts are treated as public documents, a certified copy would be admissible which would avoid the necessity of producing the original thereby avoiding the inconvenience to courts and the risk in transmitting the records to other courts.

Any petition filed for obtaining an order from the Court on affidavits filed in support of the petition.[48]

Copies of the execution petition or a counter affidavit filed in a Court.[49]

5. PUBLIC RECORDS KEPT OF PRIVATE DOCUMENTS [CLAUSE 2]

A true copy of account of election expenses lodged with the district election officer, under the Representation of People's Act, and the rules thereunder, is a public record of a private document.[72] A certified copy of the registered mortgage deed may be admissible in evidence under Section 65, C1. (e) of the Evidence Act, as secondary evidence, as it is a public record of a private document, but that does not dispense with the proof of actual execution.[73]

A memorandum of association, of a return in the custody of a registrar of Joint Stock Company would be a public record of a private document under Section 74(2). Secondary evidence by way of certified copy thereof is admissible.[74]

The original receipt executed by an individual, and registered under the Registration Act, is not a public record of a private document, as the original has to be returned to the party.[75]

It cannot be said that a private deed of trust which has been registered is a private document of which public record is required to be kept; as such, a certified copy of the deed cannot be admissible in evidence under section.[76]

A deed or a document which is registered, but the entry is made in a wrong book in the registar's office. The deed is properly registered.[77]

should be confined to those parts of Income-tax records which the income-tax officer has himself prepared and to exclude documents which he has himself called for and which have been admitted to the record for purposes of the assessment. The record of an income-tax case must be regarded as the record of the income-tax officer in making his assessment and any document properly on record is just as much a public document as the final order and assessment. A profit and loss statement and a statement showing the details of not income filed by an assessee in support of his returns are public documents under Section 74 Evidence Act, of which certified copies would be admissible under 76.[81]

In the case of Income-tax returns the question arises whether secondary evidence can be produced of the return on the ground that it is a public document under Section 74, Evidence Act. In some cases it was held that Income-tax returns being made confidential under Section 54 of the Income-tax Act certified copies cannot be admitted in evidence.[82]

In Devidatt v. Shriram,[83] the reason given for inadmissibility of secondary evidence was that the assessee had no right to inspect the original documents in the custody of the Income-tax officer and the latter was not bound to give certified copies to the assessee on demand. It was considered that the words "right to inspect" in Section 76, Evidence Act excludes all such documents as a Government officer has a right to refuse to show on the grounds of State policy, privilege etc. However in Venktramana v. Varalalu[84] it was held that there was nothing in Section 54, Income-tax Act which precludes the admissibility of a statement made by the assessee on oath before the income-tax officer. But they held, agreeing with the Bombay High Court in Devideth's case[85], that the income-tax return is not a public document. In Mythili v. Janaki[86] the question whether the income-tax return is a public document was discussed at length and it was held that it was not a public document as it was made by an assessee. In their opinion to allow a person who comes into possession of a certified copy of a return to produce it and prove the contents would be defeating the express provisions of Section 54, Income-tax Act. After considering all these decisions, the full bench of the Madras High Court in Venkata Gopala Narasimharao v. Venkataramanayya[87] held that while Section 54 of the Income-tax Act prohibits the disclosure of matters connected with the assessment and prohibits a court from requiring a public servant to produce the return or other documents mentioned in that section, it does not follow that the court may not admit in evidence those documents. This will depend upon the provisions of the Evidence Act. The return and other documents are public documents and certified copies will be admissible under Section 65(e) read with Sections 74 to 77 of the Evidence Act. In Promotha Nath v. Nirode Chandra Ghose,[88] it was held that while there can be no objection to the sole assessee using certified copy of an assessment order in evidence, it would be a staring thing if a joint assessee were permitted to use a copy of his co-assessee.

They further held that as there is no provision giving an assessee a right to inspect the assessment order, it does not fall within Section 76 and the assessee has no right to demand a certified copy and they can not be produced in proof of the contents under Section 77. They relied on Anwar Ali's case[89] and Devidatt case[90]. In Emperor v. Osman Chotani, 1942 Bom 289 it was held that Section 54, I.T. Act does not prevent the assessee from disclosing the contents of the documents specified in Section 54, I.T. Act nor does it prevent a police officer who has lawfully seized the documents from income-tax authorities from producing them. All these cases were considered in Tulsiram v. Smt. Annibai[91]. The Supreme Court, affirming the decision in Tulsiram v. Anni Bai,[92] and held that the son of an assessee was entitled to produce the assessment orders. It is submitted that the view taken by Madras High Court[93] and in other cases which hold the same view, is correct. The prohibition contained in Section 54, I.T. Act is only in regard to the officers of the income-tax department from producing the document, or give certified copies to strangers. It is always open to the assessee or his representatives either to inspect the assessment orders or the returns and to obtain certified copies. Hence, a certified copy obtained by the assessee or his representative would be admissible while a certified copy obtained by a stranger (obviously illegally) would not be admissible. The case of a joint assessee considered in[94] would stand on the same footing as a copy obtained by a stranger if sought to be relied on against the co-assessee. The Supreme Court while referring to that case also did not express any opinion on the question of production by third parties.[95]

Certified copies of public documents.

S. 76. Every public officer having the custody of a public document, which any person has a right to inspect, shall give that person on demand a copy of it on payment of the legal fees therefor, together with a certificate written at the foot of such copy that it is a true copy of such document or part thereof, as the case may be, and such certificate shall be dated and subscribed by such officer with his name and his official title, and shall be sealed, whenever such officer is authorised by law to make use of a seal, and such copies so certified shall be called certified copies.

Explanation.*—Any officer who, by the ordinary course of official duty, is authorised to deliver such copies, shall be deemed to have the custody of such documents within the meaning of this section.

COMMENTS

1. PRINCIPLE

This section provides for the means of proof of public documents which any person has a right to inspect. There is a common law right of a person to take inspection of a document in which that person is interested for the protection of such interest.[96]

Under this section every public officer having the custody of a public document, of which any person has a right to inspect, shall give that person on demand a copy of it, on payment of legal fees together with his certificate with date, name and his official title and affixing his official seal, and it would be called a certified copy. So the three things that are important are that (1) The person giving a certified copy must be a public officer having the custody of the document. (2) The document is a public document (3) The person who applies for the copy must have a right to inspect the document. Then, on payment of necessary fees the official is bound to give the copy with certificate giving the date, name etc.

The explanation to the section states that when an officer is authorised to deliver such copies he shall be deemed to have the custody of such documents. Public documents are little liable to correction or alteration because the whole community is interested in their preservation. If the production of the originals is insisted upon, great inconvenience would be caused, as the same document may be required in several places at one and the same time.

Secondly, there is the likelihood of the documents being lost or mutilated by frequent production and handling. To avoid these risks involved in the production of the original documents, this provision is made allowing the public officers to issue certified copies of the original.

The section requires that a copy of a public document given by a public officer should bear a certificate written at the foot of such copy that it is a true copy of such document. Where a copy bears no certificate and it is not supported by the evidence of the person who prepared it, it is not admissible in evidence.[1]

BEST ON EVIDENCE[2] observed: "The number of persons interested in public documents renders them much more frequently required for evidentiary purposes; and if the production of the originals were insisted on, not only would great inconvenience result from the same documents being wanted in different places at the same time, but the continual change of the place would expose them to be lost, and the handling from frequent use would soon ensure their destruction. For these and other reasons, the law deems it better to allow their contents to be proved by derivative evidence, and to run the chance, whatever that may be if errors arising from inaccurate transcriptions, either intentional or casual. It must also be remembered that, true to the principle of executing the best evidence that the nature of the matter afforded, the law requires "that this derivative evidence should be of a very trustworthy kind" and "the law has also defined, with much precision, the forms of it which may be resorted to in proof of different sorts of public writings".

Under this section the document must not only be a public document but the person concerned must have a right to inspect. It may be that document is a public document but it may not be open to inspection in which case a certified copy cannot be given, as proof of the document.

This section applies only to public documents falling under Section 74 of the Act and is not applicable to other documents.[3]

VARADACHARYAR J held that Section 76 is not an exhaustive provision, much less it is a provision declaring the grant of copies illegal in any particular case, and it is only an enabling section regarding issue of certified copies.[4]

The officer who is to issue the certified copy must be holding the office at the time when the copy was issued. Where a village patwari after his dismissal from service issued a certified copy of a document (Khatouni) it was held that it could not be treated as a certified copy, as the patwari had no authority to issue a certified copy after his dismissal.[5]

2. RIGHT TO INSPECT

Section 76 does not state under what circumstances a person would have a right to inspect. The right to inspect may be conferred by statute.

3. SOME PROVISIONS GIVING RIGHT OF INSPECTION

1. Order XX, Rule 20, C.P.C.: Certified copies of judgement and decrees shall be furnished on application, at the expense of the applicant.

2. Order XI, Rule 15, C.P.C.: Every party to the suit shall be entitled to inspect the documents and to take copies.

3. Under Section 363(5), Cr.P.C.: Any person affected by the judgment or order passed by a Criminal Court has a right to ask the Court to supply certified copies of the record which would necessarily imply the right to inspect.[6]

4. Under the Indian Registration Act, the registrar's office has to maintain five different books. Books 1 & 2 are open for inspection by any person, who can obtain copies.

In book No. 1 all documents relating to immovable property which are registered will be entered.

Book No. 2 contains the reasons, if some documents were refused to be registered.

Book No. 3 is in respect of wills and authorities to adopt and copies can be given only to the persons executing the documents of that type, or to their agents and, after the death of the executants, to any persons applying for such copies.

Book No. 4 consists of instruments other than the documents relating to immovable property. Copies can be given to the executants or persons claiming under the documents or their representatives or agents of such persons.

Book No. 5 consists of documents relating to the deposit of wills in sealed covers.

Copies can be given to the testator and, after his death, to other persons who are interested in the properties of the deceased.

5. Section 24 of Inventions and Designs Act 5 of 1888 gives a right of inspection. Under the Act a register of inventions has to be maintained.

6. Section 14 of Special Marriage Act 3 of 1872.

7. Section 19 of Registration of Societies Act 21 of 1860.

8. Section 44 of the Administrator General's Act of 1913.

9. A register of copyright about the books published in India and kept in the office of the secretary to the Government of India is open to inspection.

10. Registrar of Joint Stock Companies keeps the documents deposited with him, and they are open for inspection by any one.

11. Marriage register under the Christian Marriage Act 15 of 1872 mentions the persons entitled to inspect and obtain copies. Similarly register of marriage under the Parsee Marriage and Divorce Act 3 of 1936 as amended in 1940.

There is no general enactment conferring a right of inspection of all public documents.

LINDLAY L.J. observed: "when the right to inspect and to take a copy is not expressly conferred the extent of such right depends on the interest which the applicant has in what he wants to copy, and on what is reasonably necessary for the protection of such interest".[7]

Though Section 76 does not define or specify the expression 'person entitled to inspect the document.' It is well settled that the legislature intended to recognise the right generally for all persons who can show that they have an interest for the protection of which it is necessary that liberty to inspect such document should be given.[8]

4. TANGIBLE INTEREST

The accused who has a tangible interest in the matter, has a right to know the reason for his being committed to custody or prison.[9]

9. Circle Inspector Police v. Valu, 1972 Ker LR 922 : ILR (1973) 1 Ker 50.

Where a person has a right to have his application for allotment considered in accordance with the rules and to see that his interest was not prejudically affected by violation of the rules he has right to inspect the records to the extent necessary for the protection of his interest.[10] In Emperor v. Arumugan[11] SHEPHARD J observed: "A right to inspect public documents, is however assumed in Section 76 I think it might be inferred that the legislature intended to recognise the right generally (the right to inspect) for all persons who can show that they have an interest for the protection of which it is necessary that liberty to inspect such document should be given."[12]

That a person's interest in some other matter would be better served by the inspection of the document would not be sufficient to give him a right to inspect.[13]

The interest should be direct and tangible interest and if a person makes out sufficient interest showing that inspection is reasonably necessary for the protection of his interest he should be entitled to a certified copy.[14] A party to a suit has a tangible interest to inspect the proceeding of the court e.g. the notes of evidence in a small cause suit.[15]

A copy of a power of attorney authenticated by the registrar under Section 37(1) of the Registration Act cannot be obtained by a person who is not a party to the deed.[16]

A partner or a person claiming to be a partner in a firm is not entitled to get disclosure of the contents of a statement filed by another partner.[17]

The Bombay H.C. held that the words "right to inspect" in Section 76 exclude all documents which the Government officer refuses to show, on the ground of State policy or privilege, as the Government officer has a right to refuse inspection of the document.[18]

However in Katikineni Venkatagopala Narasimharao v. Chitluri Venkataramayya[19] it was held that the ground of public policy is not a sufficient reason for not issuing a certified copy of a public document and for excluding from the evidence any document which is legally admissible under the Evidence Act and is not excluded by statutory prohibition.

In Emperor v. Muthia Swamiyar[20] it was held that the accused has no right to inspect or obtain certified copies of statements or confessions recorded under Section 164, Cr.P.C. before the charge sheet was filed. In a Calcutta case the Court had to deal with a statement recorded during investigation by the Excise Officer under the Bengal Excise Act. It was observed that Section 173(4), Cr.P.C. was not made applicable by Section 74 of the West Bengal Excise Act though Sections 160 to 171 of Cr.P.C., were made of application and hence there was no right to inspect or get a copy.[21] The accused is not entitled to inspect or receive the copies of a post mortem report or inquest report during investigation of the case.[22]

The records of acts of public tribunals such as Labour Courts are public records which the parties to the adjudication are entitled to inspect and of which they will therefore be entitled to obtain certified copies under Section 76.[23]

If a person having no right to inspect the document produces a copy obtained illegally it is inadmissible in evidence.[24]

Under Section 123 of this Act the head of the department may refuse on the ground of privilege permission to inspect the unpublished official records relating to any affairs of the State provided the disclosures of such documents would be against public interest. Similarly, under Section 124 of this Act, no officer shall be compelled to disclose communications made to him in official confidence, when he considers that the public interest would suffer by the disclosure or allowing inspection of the documents.

An assessee has a right to inspect the order passed on appeal by the Appellate Assistant Commissioner of Income-tax. Whether any other person has a right to inspect the document is irrlevant. It is the person who has a right to inspect that is given the right to obtain a copy. Section 54 of the I.T. Act does not bar that right of inspection and obtaining copy.[25]

5. CERTIFIED COPIES

The law has created a legal presumption in favour of the genuineness of a document when it is in substantial, though not in strict, compliance with the provisions for the certification of a copy as contained in Section 76. A carbon copy can be treated as a certified copy of the order though it does not contain the certificate that it is a true copy, and the appeal filed alongwith the carbon copy of the order appealed against can be treated as validly presented.[26]

In the case of a certified copy of the electoral roll or an entry therein which is required to be filed before the returning officer under Section 33(5) of the Representation of People's Act, 1951, it was held there is no reason or scope for attaching the attributes of a certified copy under Section 76 as the Act is not made applicable to it. The Representation of People's Act does not state that the certified copy should comply with the conditions laid down in Section 76.[27]

By long usage, the term "certified copy" has acquired a special meaning, in view of the provision in Section 76 and that term, when used in connection with an appeal and with reference to the order against which the appeal is filed, has always been understood as the copy which the party preferring the appeal obtains under Section 76, on payment of the necessary fee.[28] It is the copy of the order passed on appeal by the Assistant Commissioner, furnished to the assessee on his application that is the certified copy of the order under Section 76 and not the copy served on the assessee as required under Section 33(1) of the Income-tax Act even though both are copies of the same order.[29]

The accused is entitled to a certified copy of an F.I.R. on payment of legal fees at any stage. The fee for the certified copy of a judgement is payable only at the stage of applying for such copies.[30]

The person claiming interest in the specified land cannot be refused certified copies of the land records, 'pahanies' and 'faisal patties' on the ground that the land in question is classified in the revenue records as government land.[31]

In a petition challenging the procedure for consideration of advocates for being designated as Senior Advocates, the petitioner produced the copy of the recommendations made by the Screening Committee which was not a public document within the meaning of this section but refused to disclose the source of obtaining the said copy on which the Court did not insist, it was held that the said document was not

Proof of documents by production of certified copies.

S. 77. Such certified copies may be produced in proof of the contents of the public documents or parts of the public documents of which they purport to be copies.

COMMENTS

1. PRINCIPLE AND SCOPE

The Privy Council in Collector of Gorakhpur v. Ramsunder[33] held that according to Section 76 the custodian of a public document, which any person has a right to inspect, shall give a certified copy on demand. Such certified copies are by the statutes deemed to be originals; and such certified copies (under Section 77) may be produced in proof of the contents of the public documents or parts, thereof. It is on the grounds of convenience that public documents which come within the purview of Section 74 of the Evidence Act, are allowed to be proved under this section by producing the certified copies which fulfil the conditions prescribed by Section 76.

The principle underlying this section is to obviate the production of original public documents for evidentiary purpose.[34]

2. PROOF OF PUBLIC DOCUMENTS

The Supreme Court in Ramappa v. Bojjappa [35] reversing[36] held that certified copies of public documents are admissible in evidence without being proved by calling witnesses.

The Supreme Court has held that the check memo which is required to be maintained by the officer in charge of the counting table (during elections) is a document forming record of the acts of a public officer and therefore, a certified copy thereof given by the collector in whose custody the document is kept, can be admitted in evidence in proof of the contents of the original documents.[37]

It was held that it can not be said that an admission contained in a maintenance application filed before, the Salar Jung Estates Committee, is not admissible, when a certified copy of the maintenance application was filed to prove the admission. The certified copy was granted by the Board of Revenue to which the original records of Salar Jung Trust Committee, an authority appointed under a statute enacted by the Hyderabad State Legislature, were transferred after the abolition of the Trust Committee and the records of the committee are public documents.[38]

A printed copy of an order signed by the President of the Indian Union, not purported to have been published by an order of the Government, is no proof of the order. Such an order, if not proved under Section 78, can be proved by production of the original or its certified copy under Section 77.[39]

There is a distinction between the record of the Court and the record of the act of the Court. It is only the record of the act of the Court, which is a public document. Therefore a compromise petition filed by the parties before a Court is not a public document. So also the pleadings of the parties before the Court are not public documents. But orders or decrees passed by the Courts are public documents as they are the record of the acts of the Court.[40]

A Register of Births and Deaths maintained by the Municipal Authorities, or by any public officer under the authority of a statute, is a public document and a certified copy of the extract issued by such authority is admissible to prove its contents.[41]

A notification issued under Section 18 of Travancore Forest Act is a public document and the certified copy issued by the Chief Conservator of Forests, competant authority to certify, may be produced in proof of it.[42]

Khasra girdawars are public documents and can be proved by producing certified copies.[43]

Valuation forms and line plans prepared by the custodian Department, being public documents, can be proved by production of certified copies.[44]

Where a certified copy of a registered document more than 30 years old, was issued by the registrar, it was held that mere production of a certified copy would not be enough to raise presumption of contents of the document under Section 90 as there is no presumption of execution of the document and the admission contained therein has to be proved.[45]

A document not required to be proved by calling evidence is to be marked at first hearing or the settlement of issues, Documents required to be proved by calling witnesses are to be admitted and marked when proved. This principle is also applicable to the documents led with permission of Courts after settlement of issues.[46]

Where a certified copy of a public document was proved without calling a witness and no objection was taken in the Trial Court it was held it was admisible.[47] The certified copies of FIR, Site Inspection Map, Site Inspection Memo, Panchanama, Injury Report or Post-Mortem Report and other relevant documents prepared by the police or doctor while discharging official duty are admissible in evidence without any formal proof[48]; and so is the certified copy of the registered agreement for sale.[49]

A certified copy of a private sale-deed is admissible in evidence but admissibility of a document is one thing and its probative value quite another. A document may be admissible but may not carry weight. A proof of document is something which is independent from the evidentiary value of the document. Hence, where the vendor denied the execution of the sale-deed, its execution must be proved as required under Section 67.[50] Where disciplinary proceeding was initiated against the respondent for obtaining employment by showing higher percentage of marks in SCC examination but original documents like his application and the certificate were not available so the charge was proved on the basis of the extracts produced from "Z" Register and the oral evidence of another employee who was conversant with the practice of making entries in the Register which was held to be a public document.[51]

STATE AMENDMENT

West Bengal.—New S. 78A, inserted by W.B. Act No. 20 of 1960, S. 3 (w.e.f. 5-1-1961).

"78-A. Copies of public documents, to be as good as original documents in certain cases.— Notwithstanding anything contained in this Act or any other law for the time being in force, where any public documents concerning any areas within West Bengal have been kept in Pakistan, then copies of such public documents shall, on being authenticated in such manner as may be prescribed from time to time by the State Government by notification in the Official Gazette, be deemed to have taken the place of, and to be, the original documents from which such copies were made and all references to the original documents shall be construed as including references to such copies".

COMMENTS

1. PRINCIPLE AND SCOPE

This section specifies the various ways in which the contents of a public document can be proved. This section deals with six classes of documents and the mode of proof concerning those documents. The documents referred in this section may be proved as mentioned in the section. The use of the word "may be proved" indicates that it is permissive and other modes of proof are not prohibited.[1] The word 'may' is used only as denoting a mode of proof other than the ordinary one, namely, the production of the original. For, when the original is a public document within the meaning of S. 74, a certified copy of the documents, but no other kind of secondary evidence, is admissible. Section 78 indicates only a mode of proof. Mere production of printed copy printed by the official printer is not conclusive as to its correctness.[2]

This section does not appear to have the effect of absolving the parties from any rules governing the proof of the facts on which they desire to rely.

2. ACTS, ORDERS OR NOTIFICATIONS OF GOVERNMENTS [CLAUSE (1)]

According to Cl. (1) all Acts, Orders, Notifications of the Central Government and State Governments in any of its departments, may be proved by the production of (1) the records of the departments certified by the heads of those departments, or (2) by the printed copies purporting to be printed by the order of any such Government. If such Acts, Orders, Notifications amount to laws in force, under Section 57, judicial notice can be taken.[3]

Art. 77 and Art. 166 of the Indian Constitution deal with orders and other instruments made and executed in the name of the President of the Indian Union and the Governor of a State respectively. Such orders and other instruments shall be authenticated in such manner as may be prescribed by the rules formed or made by the President or the Government and if they are so authenticated they shall not be called in question. A cyclostyled copy of typed notification attested by the Divisional Forest Officer is not an "authenticated copy" of the notification as a proof of a particular forest being reserved one. In making an act of authentication, the officer who makes it is to declare his authority to do so, his having been appointed properly by the authority for the purpose and has to say that the authenticated document is in due form of law.[4]

Court cannot take notice of an Amending Act, in the absence of an authentic copy as required under Section 78.[5]

A Gazette notification fixing the date for elections of a municipality was held to be sufficient proof of the date of elections.[6] A notification issued by a proper authority of the Government was held to be sufficiently proved under Section 78 if a copy of the Gazette notification is filed.[7] A notification published in a Government Gazette, cannot be said to be included in the definition of "Laws", and so the Court is not entitled to take judicial notice of it under Section 57. Proof can only be given under Section 78 by production of the Gazette printed under the authority of the Government.[8] But, in State of M.P. v. Romchondsan[9] overruling 1954 Nag 296, it was held that all statutory orders and notifications which are legislative in nature, amount to "Law" and the Court can take judicial notice. It was a case of notification under Section 7(1) of Telegraph Wires (Unlawful) Possession) Acts.

Extracts from official gazette, certified to be true copies by the District Medical Officer, are not admissible in evidence and the true copies should be certified by the head of the department concerned.[10]

A government notification can be proved by production of a copy certified by the head of the department which issued the same, as secondary evidence under Section 78 read with Section 65.[11] A notification under Section 18 of Travancore Forest Act declaring certain area as reserved forest may be proved by filing a certified copy thereof, issued by the Chief Conservator of Forests.[12]

A copy not certified by the head of the department is not a "certified copy" within the meaning of Section 78.[13] A cyclostyled copy of government rules with a cyclostyled covering letter, sent to various departments is not admissible as even secondary evidence of those alleged rules.[14] Any book published referring to any notification of the government was held not admissible to prove the existence of such notification.[15] The Court cannot act on a report regarding increase in dog-bites based on the subjective and personal opinion of the author and not on any impartial enquiry, investigation and collection of relevant materials and hold that the new scheme to control dog-bites was a failure.[16]

A printed copy of an order signed by the President of the India but not purporting to be published by the order of the Government,was held to be no proof of the order. If it is not proved u/Section 78 or by a certified copy according to Section 77, or by filing an affidavit of any responsible officer, it must be held that there is no proof of it.[17]

In a case there was a difference in the wording of Art. 177 of the Limitation Act, between what was contained in a book and what was in the gazette, the version in the book was preferred to that in the gazette.[18] The Lahore High Court has, on the other hand, held that the text published in the Gazette must be taken to be the authorized text of the Limitation Act under cl. (2) of this section.[19]

3. PROCEEDINGS OF LEGISLATURES [CLAUSE (2)]

This clause deals with the proceedings of Legislatures. They can be proved by the journals published by the Parliament, State Legislature or State Council or by published Acts or abstracts, or by printed copies purporting to be printed by the order of the Government.

The proceedings of Parliament may be proved under cl. (2) by the Journals of the House of Commons or by copies purporting to be printed by order of the Government.

Regarding Journals, the Federal Court held that "The proceedings of Parliament fall under either the second or fourth of the categories set out in this section; it may be said that the reference in the second category to proceedings of "the Legislatures" following immediately upon the first category which is confined to acts, orders or notifications of the Central Government in India, is to be taken as a reference to the legislatures of India only: "the Legislatures" to which the second category referes are intended to include all the legislatures which have the power to make laws for India or for any part thereof. The official parliamentary debates are not the journals of two houses of parliament in the narrower sense of that expression; each house publishes its own journals which contain a formal record of the business done and may be described as the minutes of their proceedings; and these journals may, in an English Court, be proved by copies thereof purporting to be printed by the printers to the Crown or by printers to either house of Parliament..... the expression 'journals', however, in Section 78 is plainly to be given a broad and general meaning, since it is not confined to the journals of the Houses of Parliament, but includes journals of other legislatures also; and there is no reason, therefore why, in its application to Parliament, it should necessarily be confined to the journals of the two Houses of Parliament above, if it can be shown that the Houses have authorised the publication of other official records of their proceedings and that these records are printed "by order of Government".[20]

The official report of the proceedings of the House of Lords was held to be proof of the fact that the proclamation of emergency declared by the Governor-General-in-Council under Section 102(1) of Government of India Act was approved by the House of Lords.[21]

Under Section 57 the court shall take judicial notice of the proceedings in Parliament and of the Legislatures in the State. Proceedings are normally published under the authority of the concerned Government in a book form, which can be referred to. In respect of the Acts which have been passed, they would be published in a book form besides their publication in the Government gazette. Both can be referred to by the court.[22]

Reports of proceedings of the State Legislative Assembly during the passage of impugned statutes are admissible as public documents under Section 78(2).[23]

Reports of the debates in the Legislative Assembly can only be evidence of what was stated by the speakers in the Legislative Assembly, and are not evidence of any facts contained in the speeches.[24]

PHIPSON[25] states "Neither Hansard's Debates, nor the Authorised Parliamentary Debates printed by the Government, are, however, admissible to prove the questions, answers, and speeches of members, these publications not having the authority of Parliamentary Journals".[26]

It was held by the Supreme Court that facts stated in the newspaper are in the nature of hearsay and no notice can be taken of such facts as the newspaper is not one of the documents referred to in Section 78(2) to prove the allegation of facts, unless the maker, publisher, or reporter who sent the report was examined in respect of that news item.[27]

4. PROCEEDINGS OF A MUNICIPAL BODY [CLAUSE (5)]

The proceedings of a Municipal Board can be proved under clause (5) by a copy of such proceedings, certified by the legal keeper, or by a printed book purported to have been published under the authority of such municipal body.[28] Mere production of the printed proceedings would not be sufficient unless it purports to be published under the authority of such municipal body.[29]

Where there was a resolution of the Municipal Council authorising the Municipal Commissioner who in turn gave authority in favour of Sanitary Inspectors who would be prosecution witnesses, it was held that the order of the Commissioner was not admissible as evidence of the Municipal Resolution under Section 78(5).[30]

Where there was a resolution of the Municipality authorising the Assistant Municipal prosecutor to institute and conduct prosecutions under the prevention of Food Adulteration Act, it was held that when the Commissioner of the Municipality authorised the head clerk of the central office to attest the copies, it was valid attestation, though it was not attested by the legal keeper of the records.[31]

5. PUBLIC DOCUMENTS OF ANY OTHER CLASS IN A FOREIGN COUNTRY [CLAUSE (6)]

As to Foreign Law Sections 38, 45 and 84 of this Act may be referred to, regarding foreign judgments Section 12, C.P.C., and the effect of them Section 13, C.P.C., and as to the certified copies of foreign judgments Section 14, C.P.C., may be referred to. Section 86 of this Act deals with presumption regarding certified copies of foreign records.

SUBBARAO J., (Majority expressing no opinion) observed: "Section 78(6) of the Evidence Act makes it clear that, apart from the two certificates—one by the legal keeper of the original document and the other by the Consul General—there shall also be proof of the character of the foreign judgment according to the law of the foreign country before it can be admitted. It is a condition precedent. Proof of this condition can be by direct or circumstantial evidence. Proof can also be given by placing before the court facts giving rise to presumption rebuttable or irrebuttable. Section 86 of the Evidence Act lays down that a court may presume the genuineness and accuracy of any document purporting to be a certified copy of any judicial record of any foreign country, if such a copy is duly certified in a manner and according to the rules in use in the country for certification of copies of judicial records. To give rise to this presumption it is not necessary that the judicial record of the foreign country should have already been admitted in evidence. While Section 78(6) lays down three conditions for admitting a foreign judgment in evidence, the admission of the judgment is not a condition precedent for drawing the requisite presumption under Section 86. The presumption may be drawn before the said judgment is admitted and by virtue of presumption of genuineness of the copy of the judgment, arising under Section 86 the third condition under Section 78(6) viz., the character of the document according to the law of the foreign country may be said to have been proved and the judgment may be admitted".[32]

The copy of a birth entry in a record of the Town Committee of a town situated in Pakistan was held not admissible in evidence, in the absence of attestation by the High Commissioner for India in Pakistan, to prove the date of birth before a court in India.[33]

It was held that, even if strict rules of evidence may be deemed to apply to the proceedings before the Rehabilitation Authorities, under the displaced persons. (Compensation and Rehabilitation) Act of 1954, the Authorities have no jurisdiction to ask for any other mode of proof for proving a public document of a foreign country than the one prescribed by Section 78(6).

Records of a court in Berlin authenticated as required by law were held admissible.[34]

The words 'diplomatic Agent' in Cl. (6), are very wide and prima facie cover the Resident of Hyderabad who was a political agent of the Government of India. A certified copy of a transfer certificate granted by the Head Master of a School certified by the Resident was held to be admissible.[35] Where the political agent had not certified the copy of the evidence in a civil court (Kutch court) in the manner required under Section 76, it was held not to be admissible and Section 86 of the Evidence Act did not exclude its proof.[36]

It is to be observed that the section does not say how any fact, historical or otherwise, is to be proved by the parties, but gives the court liberty to resort for its aid to appropriate books or documents of reference on matters of public history.[37]

A carbon copy of a Court order issued by official process, but not marked as "true copy" has been regarded as good evidence.[38] The landlord refused to receive the money sent by the tenant by money order. The post office issued a letter showing refusal. The letter was based on a public record and, therefore, held relevant.[39]

Once a document is held to be a "public document" within the meaning of Section 74, if it is properly proved under Section 78, the presumption in respect of the contents of public documents would apply irrespective of whether the public document is of British India or of a Foreign State.[40]

PRESUMPTIONS AS TO DOCUMENTS

Presumption as to genuineness of certified copies.

S. 79. The Court shall presume to be genuine every document purporting to be a certificate, certified copy or other document, which is by law declared to be admissible as evidence of any particular fact and which purports to be duly certified by any officer of the Central Government or of a State Government, or by any officer in the State of Jammu and Kashmir who is duly authorised thereto by the Central Government:

Provided that such document is substantially in the form and purports to be executed in the manner directed by law in that behalf.

The Court shall also presume that any officer by whom any such document purports to be signed or certified, held, when he signed it, the official character which he claims in such paper.

COMMENTS

1. PRINCIPLE AND SCOPE

Sections 79 to 90 deal with certain presumptions as to documents.

This section proceeds upon the maxim omina proesumuntur rite esse acta a (all acts are presumed to be rightly done). In fact all the following sections down to S. 90 inclusive, are illustrations of, and founded upon, this principle. But though the courts are directed to draw a presumption in favour of official certificates, it is not a conclusive presumption; it is rebuttable. It is but a prima facie presumption, and if the certificate, etc., be not correct, its incorrectness may be shown. On the same maxim stands the last clause of this section. It is very old law that where a person acts in an official capacity it shall be presumed that he was duly appointed.[41]

This section applies to certificates, certified copies or other documents which are duly certified, by an officer of the Central Government or of a State Government or by an officer in the State of Jammu and Kashmir who is authorised by the Central Government in that behalf, to be genuine.

This section imperatively directs the court to raise a presumption by using the words 'shall presume'.

Under this section a court is bound to draw the presumption that a certified copy of a document is genuine and also that the officer signed it in the official character which he claimed in the said document.[42]

The words 'shall presume' indicate that if no other evidence is given, the court is bound to find that the facts mentioned in the section exist. They occur in Ss. 79-85 and S. 89. These sections are, therefore, mandatory. On the other hand Sections 80 to 88 and 90 deal with matters which the court may presume. Apart from these Sections there is another Section 114 whereunder the court may presume certain facts and things. The sections which use the expression "may presume" are all permissive and there is wide discretion for the court to presume or not to presume, though such discretion must be judicially exercised.

STEPHEN in his introduction (p. 144) states "Where a document, purporting to be a certified copy of a record of evidence, is produced, it must, by Section 79, be presumed to be an accurate copy of the record of evidence; and, by Section 80, the facts stated in the record itself, as to the circumstances under which it was taken, e.g. that it was read over to the witness in a language which he understood, must be presumed to be true..... Many classes of documents that are defined in the Act are presumed to be what they purport to be, but this presumption is liable to be rebutted." At page 170, he observes "Many classes of documents which are defined in the Act, are presumed to be what they purport to be, but this presumption is liable to be rebutted. Two sets of presumptions will sometimes apply to the same document. For instance, if what purports to be certified copy of a record of evidence is produced, it must by Section 79 be presumed to be an accurate copy of the record itself as to the circumstances under which it was taken, e.g. that it was read over to the witness in a language which he understood must be presumed to be true".

The expression "shall presume to be genuine" implies raising of a presumption of genuineness from the certified copy as to the correctness of the record, and also as to the genuineness of such copy.[43]

Where a document bearing a seal and signature of the officer mentioned that the officer named in it had authority to certify the copy, it was held that the document must be presumed to be duly certified.[44] A presumption of genuiness is attached to the entries in Birth and Death Registers maintained under a statute, as the registers are public documents, and a heavy onus lies on the party who wants to displace the presumption. Correctness of certified copy shall be presumed under Section 79.[45]

Certificate of Registration under Section 60 of the Registration Act must be presumed to be genuine.[46]

A certified copy of a document can be admitted without any formal proof in view of Section 63 and 79.[47]

In a divorce case, when a certified copy of the FIR, was tendered in evidence, it was held that it was admissible.[48]

A certificate signed by the visitors of a Lunatic Asylum or a Mental Hospital and the Superintendent of the hospital comes within Section 79 and no formal proof of the document is required.[49]

Certified copy of a revenue record raises a presumption of its genuineness.[50]

Entry in a register which is not required by law to be maintained, should be proved in the same manner as any other fact is to be proved, as no legal presumption is available to such an entry or the register.[51]

Where a plaintiff sent a letter to the Nazir department and it was filed in the records of the department it was held that the letter becomes a public document and if a photostat and not a certified copy was filed it was not admissible to prove the document.[52]

Where a carbon copy of an order of court contained necessary particulars indicating its authenticity as issued by a Court though not bearing a certificate of its being a true copy, it was held that the carbon copy can be treated as a certified copy and an appeal filed along with it was valid.[53]

Where the original sale deed was said to have been eaten away by white ants and a certified copy was marked as exhibit and the other side raised no objection, and a witness deposed as to the fact of sale, it was held that its genuiness cannot be agitated in appeal by raising objection as to the mode of proof. [54]

It was held by the Bombay High Court that Section 79 only raises a rebuttable presumption with regard to the genuineness of certified copies, if they are executed substantially in the form and in the manner provided by law; it was further held that in all cases of secondary evidence under Section 65 read with Section 63 when a copy or an oral account is admitted as secondary evidence, the execution of the original is not required to be proved, but if the original itself is sought to be tendered, it must be duly proved and there is no reason for applying a different rule to public documents. Neither Section 67 nor Section 68, which lay down that the signature and the handwriting on a document must be duly proved, make any exception in the case of public documents.[55]

It can be shown that the officer who certified it, does not hold the official character which he claims.[56]

Where a letter purporting to be issued from the Chief Secretary to the Government of Bengal was signed by a Deputy Secretary, not in his official capacity, but "for the Chief Secretary," it was held that there was no legal proof that the Local Government had ordered or authorized a prosecution under Section 196 of the Criminal Procedure Code. The presumption under this section would have arisen if the letter had been signed by the Chief Secretary himself.[57]

2. INCOMPLETE DOCUMENT

Where the certified copy of a judgment bore no date and signature of the Judge and its final portion was missing, the said document, being incomplete, its certified copy was inadmissible in evidence.[58]

Presumption as to documents produced as record of evidence.

S. 80. Whenever any document is produced before any Court, purporting to be a record or memorandum of the evidence, or of any part of the evidence, given by a witness in a judicial proceeding or before any officer authorized by law to take such evidence, or to be a statement or confession by any prisoner or accused person, taken in accordance with law, and purporting to be signed by any Judge or Magistrate, or by any such officer as aforesaid, the Court shall presume—that the document is genuine; that any statement as to the circumstances under which it was taken, purporting to be made by the person signing it, are true, and that such evidence, statement or confession was duly taken.

COMMENTS

This section dispenses with the necessity of formal proof of certain documents.

This section makes it obligatory on the part of a Court to draw a presumption of genuineness in respect of judicial documents i.e., deposition of witnesses in a judicial proceeding, or before any officer authorised by law to take such evidence, or statements or confessions by a prisoner or accused person which are recorded in accordance with the provisions of law. The first part deals with depositions recorded in a judicial proceeding. The second part deals with depositions recorded by officers authorised by law to record the deposition. There is no general presumption that every officer is authorised by law to record evidence. The third part deals with statements or confessions of prisoners or accused persons recorded in accordance with law, purporting to be signed by a Judge or Magistrate or any other officer who is authorised by law to so record. Magistrates of first class, have generally the power to record statements or confessions. Magistrates of second class have to be specially empowered to record under Cr.P.C. As the Magistrates record statements or confessions or evidence in open court, they observe prescribed rules and formalities which afford sufficient guarantee for raising the presumption that it was correctly done. When such a document is placed before the court, this section says that it shall be presumed that the document is genuine, that any statements as to the circumstances under which it was taken, purporting to be made by the person signing it, are true; and such evidence, statement or confession was duly taken[59]. This section makes it unnecessary for any formal proof of such document noted in the section; this section has nothing to do with admissibility which is dealt with by other sections in the Evidence Act.[60]

The presumptions to be raised under this section are considerably wider than those under S. 79. They embrace not only the genuineness of the document, but that it was duly taken and given under the circumstances recorded in the document. The presumptions under this section are not conclusive; they may be rebutted.

In Section 4 definiting the expression "shall presume" it is stated that wherever it is directed by this Act that the court shall presume a fact, it shall regard that fact as proved, unless and until it is disproved. It follows that what is presumed under this section (or other sections wherein the expression 'shall presume' is used) is only a rebuttable presumption and what is presumed is not conclusive.

The word "Evidence" is defined in Section 3 of this Act. Order XVIII, Rules 5 to 13, C.P.C., and Sections 272 to 283, Cr.P.C., 1973, prescribe the mode of recording evidence. The Judges or Magistrates or other officers empowered to record evidence, statements or confessions are expected to observe the rules which prescribe the mode of recording.

An affidavit is not evidence as defined in the Act and so it cannot be presumed to be genuine udner this section.[61] No presumption of truth arises in favour of the entries made in the revenue records not in accordance with law.[62]

The word 'Judicial Proceeding' is not defined in the Act. There is a reference to judicial proceeding in Section 1 and 33. Section 4 of the Criminal Procedure Code defines a judicial proceeding as including a proceeding in the court of which evidence is or may be legally taken on oath.

This section will not apply to any statement failing to satisfy the provisions of S. 33.

Where on a deposition it is endorsed that the deposition was read out to the witness and admitted by him as correct, the Court is bound to accept it as correct under Section 80, until proved to be untrue. Even if it be that the deposition was not read over that would only amount to a curable irregularity.[63] It was held earlier that where the deposition of witness was not read over in the presence of the accused or his pleader according to Section 360, Cr.P.C. (Old), (Section 278, new Cr.P.C.) it is not admissible and no other evidence is admissible in proof of the statements in the deposition.[64]

But in Elahi Baksh v. R,[65] the Calcutta High Court observed: "I can see no reason why, even in a prosecution for perjury, failure to comply with the provisions of Rules 5 and 6 of Order XVIII, CPC should render a deposition entirely inadmissible in evidence or why, if Section 80 cannot be called in aid, the deposition should not be proved, for instance by a judge who takes it down, or by the admission of the deponent. If it can be proved in such way, Section 91 will have no application.[66]

The presumption under Section 80 arises only when a confession is recorded strictly in accordance with law; since no procedure has been prescribed in law for recording of the statements by customs authorities under Section 171-A of the Customs Act (1878), no presumption can be raised under Section

80 of the Evidence Act, when the recording of statement under Section 171-A is in English and there is failure to interpret it to the illiterate accused, conviction would be improper; that apart, it has to be decided on the facts and circumstances of the case whether the confession was free and voluntary.[67]

This section is not applicable to a statement taken by an officer who has no jurisdiction or whose appointment is ultra vires.[68]

Where Order XVIII, R. 5, C.P.C., has been complied with in recording evidence of witnesses, the court is bound to accept the evidence recorded, as correct under Section 80, until it is proved to be untrue. The court including a court of appeal cannot suo motu conduct an enquiry to examine its correctness.[69]

It was held that a declaration made under the proviso to Cl. 2 of Goa, Daman and Diu (Citizenship) Order (1962) is not covered by Section 80 and presumption of genuineness cannot be drawn.[70]

An accused after murdering his wife, went to the house of a Tahsildar exercising 2nd class Magisterial powers and confessed his guilt. The Tahasildar sent for the police. After the arrival of the head constable, the accused was arrested. Then the Tahsildar after recording the confession, handed him over to the head constable. The Supreme Court after finding that the Tahsildar exercising 2nd class Magisterial powers was not specially empowered to record any statement during investigation, held that no presumption can be drawn under Section 80, as it cannot be said that the confession was recorded in accordance with law.[71]

If the confession is recorded in gross disregard of the precaution prescribed by Section 164, Cr.P.C., it will be entirely inadmissible.[72]

The expression 'Judicial Proceeding' does not apply to a statement recorded under Section 164, Cr.P.C. by a Magistrate during the course of investigation from a person who is not an accused.[73]

The presumption under Section 80 cannot attach to the record of a court which is not competent to try the case. Such statements may however be proved during a fresh trial.[74]

2. STATEMENT

The use of the expression "statement" or "confession" in Section 80 in juxta position to a prisoner or an accused person and the context in which those words occur point out that it was intended that a statement as well as a confession of a prisoner or an accused duly taken by a Magistrate is to be presumed to be genuine. It is not correct to say that the word "statement" has reference to a statement of a witness as distinguished from a "confession" made by a prisoner or an accused person.[75]

As Section 80 authorises the court to presume that the document is genuine, that any statements as to the circumstances under which it was taken be true and if it is a confession it was truely taken in accordance with law, the examination of the Magistrate is generally unnecessary, though it may be necessary in some cases.[76]

The depositions and statements may be proved by the production of the document without any witness being called to prove it.[77] A dying declaration, which has been recorded by a Magistrate, can be tendered in evidence without the Magistrate who recorded it being called.[78] When a dying declaration is taken and a certificate is appended that it was read over to the deponent and is signed by the Magistrate, there is a presumption under Section 80 that what is stated is true.[79] Confessional statement of an accused recorded in compliance with Section 164, Cr.P.C., can be admitted into evidence and made an exhibit even without examining the Magistrate who recorded it.[80]

The record of a statement made by a witness to a Police Officer during investigation is not a record of evidence, the police investigation is not a judicial proceeding within this section.[81]

Where there is substantial compliance of Section 164, reliance can be placed on Section 29 and 80 of the Evidence Act and any non-compliance may be regularised under Section 533 (new Section 463) Cr.P.C.[82]

So far as confessions are concerned, Section 24 of this Act places restrictions on the admissibility by stating that if it appears to the court, that making of the confession was by inducement, threat or promise it would not take it into consideration. Subject to such restrictions under Section 24, the presumption of genuineness under this section can be drawn and there is no inconsistency between Section 24 and 80.[83]

Where the confession of an accused was found as one induced by police by torture, though having been recorded by the Magistrate properly, it would be improper to draw presumption under Section 80.[84]

The Court will presume that a confession was duly recorded and that the circumstances under which the confession was recorded were such as had been set down in the record made by the Magistrate. It says nothing about there being any presumption regarding the voluntariness of the confession.[85]

Where a confession, made before a Magistrate, did not bear his certificate, stating his belief that it was freely and voluntarily made, as required by S. 164(3) of the Criminal Procedure Code, it was held that it could not be admitted under this section without proof of its having been so made.[86]

Where a person was charged for the offence of perjury under the Penal Code, as his deposition as a witness, contained a false statement, it was held that his deposition is to be produced in evidence not for purpose of proving its truth but for purpose of proving that he made it; that the Penal Code does not pay any regard to the question whether the deposition was read over or not to the witness as required under Section 360, Cr.P.C.[87]

Where the deposition of a witness was not signed by a judge no presumption can be drawn under Section 80 that he had signed on it. When the recordings of those depositions was not denied they are not invalid due to omission of judge's signature.[88]

The statement of a witness in the committal proceedings comes within the scope of Section 74 as public documents. So, certified copies can be granted under Section 76 and they can be produced as proof of the contents of the same under Section 77. Presumption of genuineness is also available in respect of the certified copies of their depositions under Section 80.[89]

Section 288, Cr.P.C. of 1973 (corresponding to Section 287 old Cr.P.C.) says "the examination of the accused duly recorded by or before the committing Megistrate shall be tendered by the prosecutor and read as evidence". If such evidence was placed before the court and if the witness is examined, the evidence recorded before the committing Magistrate may be treated as evidence for all purposes i.e., for contradiction or impeaching the credit under Section 145 or for corroboration under Section 157 of this Act or as substantive evidence, as the basis of finding a verdict.[90]

3. IDENTITY OF THE DEPONANT

Though there is presumption under Section 80 regarding the statements in a deposition in an earlier case as genuine, there is no presumption as to the identity of the deponent; when the certified copy is produced in a later proceeding and the identity of the deponent has to be proved.[91]

Though under Section 80 the presumption of genuineness is only in respect of a statement recorded and not to the identity of the deponent, the court can look into the deposition itself to find out whether there is inherent evidence as to the identity of the deponent. If the deponent comes and admits that his deposition was recorded on a particular date and in a particular matter, no further proof of identity is necessary.[92]

The Lahore High Court went to the extent of holding that not only a statement recorded in accordance with law by an officer authorised to record it and signed by him must be presumed to be genuine but also a statement made by the person concerned as expressly mentioned in the record of the statement. It may however be noted that in that case the identity was sufficiently proved by other evidence.[93]

In the case of a very old document this may create difficulty as it will be practically impossible to get evidence of the identity of the deponent. However one can turn to the deposition to find inherent evidence as to the identity.[94]

Where a Registrar's endorsement showed that a person presented a document for registration and was identified by two persons, it was held that there is presumption of the execution of the document according to the Registrar's endorsement but it has to be shown that the person who admitted the execution was not an impostor[95]

4. MEMORANDUM OF IDENTIFICATION

A presumption under Section 80 could only arise, if the memorandum of identification amounted to "evidence" within the meaning of Section 3 of the Act. Statements of the identifying witness recorded by a Magistrate in the identification memo under Section 164, Cr.P.C. are neither made by the witnesses in a judicial proceeding nor are they made on oath or affirmation, in order to amount to "evidence" within Section 3 of Act.[96]

A confession made by an accused before a Magistrate in a former Indian State cannot be admitted in evidence under this section. The Magistrate recording the confession must be examined to prove all the confession before it can be used as evidence.[97]

The section does not deal with admissibility. It merely dispenses with the necessity of formal proof in certain cases.[98]

The presumption under Section 80 applies as much to a certified copy of the deposition as to the original.[99]

Under Order XVIII, Rule 15, CPC, the evidence of a witness should be read over to the witness. But there is no provision requiring the judge to certify that it has been so read over. Hence when in fact it is read over, the absence of such certificate does not render Section 80 inapplicable.[1] Where a deposition was not read over to the witness who read it himself it was held that there was substantial compliance with the relevant rule and the benefit of Section 80 of the Act is available.

Presumption as to Gazettes, newspapers, private Acts of Parliament and other documents.

S. 81. The Court shall presume the genuineness of every document purporting to be the London Gazette or any Official Gazette, or the Government Gazette of any colony, dependency or possession of the British Crown, or to be a newspaper or journal, or to be a copy of a private Act of Parliament of the United Kingdom printed by the Queen's Printer and of every document purporting to be a document directed by any law to be kept by any person, if such document is kept substantially in the form required by law and is produced from proper custody.

SYNOPSIS

1. Principle ... 743
2. Gazettes ... 743
3. Gazetteers ... 744
4. Newspapers or Journals ... 744

COMMENTS

1. PRINCIPLE

This section deals with four sets of documents which shall be presumed to be genuine. They are:

(1) Gazettes

(2) Gazzeteers

(3) Newspapers or journals

(4) Every document directed by any law to be kept by any person, if that document is kept substantially in the form required by law and is produced from proper custody.

Section 57, Cl. (7) of this Act states that if the fact of appointment to any public office is notified in any official gazette, the accession to the office, names, titles, functions and signatures of the person, filling that public office, may be taken judicial notice of.

Section 37 of this Act provides that when the court has to form an opinion as to the existence of any fact of public nature, any statement of it made in an official gazette is relevant.

Section 78(3) refers to proclamations, orders or regulations issued by the King or Queen or the Privy Council in the United Kingdom and they may be proved by production of the extracts of the London gazette.

The latter part of Section 81 deals with most of the documents containing matters referred to in Section 35 and which are declared to be public documents under Section 74.

2. GAZETTES

Though a gazette is not a conclusive evidence of the facts contained therein, the Court may in conjunction with other evidence and circumstances take it into consideration in adjudging the dispute in question.[2] When orders and notifications of a Government are published in the Government gazette, the court is entitled to take judicial notice under Section 57 and presume their genuineness under Section 81.[3] Where the state of affairs as to governmental business is published in a Government publication, it shall be presumed to be correct and genuine, unless rebutted.[4]

It was held by the Nagpur High Court that though prima facie, the genuineness of a particular order published in the gazette of India has to be presumed under Section 81, it is a rebuttable presumption. In that case when a document purporting to be the same order printed in the Government Press of India was produced with a covering letter from the Secretary of the Government of India, from proper custody, and was in different terms, it was held that the order published in the gazette was wrongly printed.[5]

3. GAZETTEERS

The Supreme Court held that where the question is whether the Math is "public" or "private" within the meaning of Section 6(7) of the Orissa H.R.E. Act 4 of 1939, the statements in the gazetteer can be relied on as providing historical material regarding the practice followed by the Math and its head.[6]

The statements in the final report on settlement operations stating on what basis entries were made in the Record of Rights, are more authentic and reliable than the statements made in the District gazetteers.[7] Though this section refers to production from lawful custody, the Lahore High Court held that, if the Court has the concerned gazette, it is enough for the court under Section 81 to draw the presumption though it is not tendered.[8]

There is no presumption of correctness attached to a copy of mutation record as to the date of death of the last holder.[9] Though the entries in the Patwari's annual report continued for 10 or 11 years, there cannot be any presumption under Section 81.[10] Regarding a report of a court of Enquiry appointed under Rule 75 of the Indian Aircraft Rules it was held that no presumption can be drawn under Section 81 and it has to be proved.[11]

In spite of the oral evidence to the contrary, a court can take judicial notice of existence of a fact from the original judicial record on its file and presumption under Section 81 shall be drawn as to its correctness.[12]

4. NEWSPAPERS OR JOURNALS

In Laxmi Raj Shetty v. State of Tamil Nadu[13] the Supreme Court held that facts stated in newspapers are hearsay in nature and are inadmissible unless the maker of the statement is examined; and that judicial notice cannot be taken of such facts.[14] The paper itself is not proof of its contents. Even if it is admitted in evidence without formal proof, it only amounts to an anonymous statement.[15]

HALSBURY[16] states that a witness may refresh his memory by refering to a newspaper report, if he read it at the time when he had recollection of the statement therein contained and knew them to be true; but a newspaper report is not generally admissible as evidence of facts recorded in it.[17]

A person who heard a speech and who read it in a newspaper at or near the time of the transaction, may refresh his memory by refering to that newspaper; he can say that he knew it to be correct when he read it. It is immaterial that the document was not printed by him or in his presence.

Under Section 7 of the Press and Registration of Books Act 25 of 1867 on the production of an authenticated copy a declaration made under the Act is admissible to prove that the person mentioned in the declaration is the publisher of a journal or newspaper.

SUNDARA IYER J. observed: that it is very doubtful whether the language of the section supports the contention that Section 81 applies to public documents and not to newspapers; that the existence of a comma after the word "Journal" is against such contention; that even otherwise, the natural import of the words in the section do not appear to favour the view that the paper "printed by the Queen's printer" not only qualifies the expression "private Act of Parliament" but also "newspaper or journal;" that if once a person is proved to be a publisher of a newspaper, then a presumption under Section 81 can be drawn that what purports to be a newspaper of a particular name is that paper and that every copy of it was issued by the publisher of that paper; but the presumption under Section 81 does not include a presumption that it was printed and published by a person by whom it purports to be.[18]

Where a person was prosecuted for publication of defamatory matter in a newspaper and the question was whether the matter amounted to defamation, it was held that production of a copy of the newspaper raises a presumption of the publication by him and the burden shifts to the accused to disprove it.[19]

An extract of Government notification, in a newspaper is inadmissible[20] and so is the translated copy of a news item in absence of the whole newspaper having been filed.[21]

The Nagpur High Court in Hasanali v. Dara Shah[22] following Cliquot's Champague's case 3 Wall (U.S.) 114, held that a catalogue of a firm is good evidence of the price etc., of the goods, and it is not hearsay.

The Commercial Community would normally rely on market reports in newspapers which are based on general survey of the whole market. COOLEY J. observed: "Evidence of the state of the markets as derived from the market reports in the newspapers should not have been excluded..... As a matter of fact such reports which are based upon a general survey of the whole market and are constantly received and acted upon by dealers, are far more satisfactory and reliable than individual entries or individual sales or inquiries".[23]

Presumption as to Gazettes in electronic forms.

[24][S. 81-A. The Court shall presume the genuineness of every electronic record purporting to be the Official Gazette, or purporting to be electronic record directed by any law to be kept by any person, if such electronic record is kept substantially in the form required by law and is produced from proper custody.]

COMMENTS

Presumption as to document admissible in England without proof of seal or signature.

S. 82. When any document is produced before any Court, purporting to be a document which, by the law in force for the time being in England or Ireland, would be admissible in proof of any particular in any Court of Justice in England or Ireland, without proof of the seal or stamp or signature authenticating it, or of the judicial or official character claimed by the person by whom it purports to be signed, the Court shall presume that such seal, stamp or signature is genuine, and that the person signing it held, at the time when he signed it, the judicial or official character which he claims, and the document shall be admissible for the same purpose for which it would be admissible in England or Ireland.

COMMENTS

1. PRINCIPLE

This section enables the courts to recognise presumptions with regard to certain classes of documents which are recognized in English Courts. The Court must presume (a) that the seal or stamp or signature is genuine; and (b) that the person signing the document held, at the time when he signed, the judicial or official character he claims. Documents which, without proof of the seal or signature, or of the official character of the person by whom they purport to have been signed, are admissible in England, will be admissible in Courts in India.

LORD BROUGHAM'S Act of 1851 (14 and 15 Vic c. 99) Section 11 was in the following terms: "Every document which, by any law now in force or hereafter to be in force, is or shall be admissible in evidence of any particular fact in any court of Justice in England or Wales or Ireland without proof of the seal or stamp or signature authenticating the same, or of the judicial or official character of the person appearing to have signed the same, shall be admitted in evidence to the same extent and for the same purpose in any Court of Justice of any of the British colonies, or before any person having in any of such colonies, by law or consent of parties, authority to hear, receive and examine evidence, without proof of the seal or stamp, or signature, authenticating the same, or of the judicial or official character of the person appearing to have signed the same." Section 11 and Section 19 of the aforesaid Act which included India in the definition of "British colonies" were repealed by the Indian Evidence Act (see Section 2 of the Evidence Act, and the Schedule to the Act) and instead the present section has been enacted, whch substantially reproduces the repealed sections of LORD BROUGHAM'S Act.

Certified copies of the Probates granted by the Probate Division of the High Court of England, are admissible without proof under Section 82.[25]

A certificate issued by the Manchester Chamber of Commerce testifying about the existence of a strike of coal mines is not a document coming within Section 82.[26]

Presumption as to maps or plans made by authority of Government.

S. 83. The Court shall presume that maps or plans purporting to be made by the authority of the Central Government or any State Government were so made, and are accurate; but maps or plans made for the purposes of any cause must be proved to be accurate.

1. PRINCIPLE

According to this section maps and plans purporting to have been made by the authority of the Central or the State Government, shall be presumed to have been so made and be accurate. Other maps and plans which are made for the purpose of any cause or by any other agency must be proved to be accurate like any other fact. Where maps are prepared by private persons no presumption in favour of accuracy can be drawn under this section.

This section must be read with Section 36, which deals with statements in maps, charts and plans. These are provable under Sections 77 and 79 by the production of certified copies.

The presumption as to accuracy is limited only to maps or plans made under the authority of Government.[27] Such maps or plans contain the results of inquiries made under competent public authority. In all other cases proof of accuracy is needed.

There is a distinction between relevancy and accuracy of maps and plans. According to Section 36 of this Act the statements of facts made in maps or charts published and generally offered for sale, and in maps or plans made under the authority of Government (Central or State) are by themselves relevant facts. Unless the statement of facts made in maps or plans are held to be relevant for a decision of a fact in issue before the Court, no question of drawing a presumption under Section 83 would arise. Under Section 36 there is no mention of presumption as to the accuracy of the statement of facts made in maps or plans.[28]

The presumption under this section is not conclusive and is rebuttable. In the absence of evidence to the contrary, the court shall presume the accuracy of the maps and plans prepared by the authority of Central or State Government as they would be made on the results of certain enquiries by competent officers concerned with due publicity of matters in which the public are interested.[29]

Regarding maps printed and expressly bearing an endorsement of the Government, presumption of accuracy arises under Section 83.[30]

RENELL'S MAP in regard to road surveys and river surveys were held to be scientific and accurate and a presumption of accuracy should be drawn under Section 83. But the village sites shown in that map which was published before 1917 were held to be approximate.[31] Subsequently RENELL'S MAP was withdrawn from circulation by the Government and hence was held not admissible.[32]

Entries in the Cadastral survey map have presumptive value against the landlord of a neighbouring estate.[33]

Relying on a map published by the Government it was held that the revocation of a licence for the supply of electric energy given to a company was valid as the company supplied the electricity to an area outside the area of supply.[34]

In a case where a property in dispute was purchased from the Custodian Department, it was held that in the absence of evidence to the contrary, there was presumption of the accuracy in respect of the valuation forms and line plans prepared as per the rules made under the Displaced Persons (Compensation and Rehabilition) Act of 1954, as they are prepared under the authority of the Government [35] The development plan prepared in compliance with the statutory provisions whose validity was never challenged and presumption of its correctness never rebutted, will be taken to be accurate.[36]

2. MAPS OR PLANS MADE BY PRIVATE PERSONS

The Supreme Court in Ram Kishore v. Union of India,[37] held that in the case of maps prepared by private persons and not under the authority of the Government, no presumption in favour of the accuracy can be drawn under Section 83. Where a village was shown as being in a particular district in the maps prepared under the authority of the Government, a presumption shall be drawn as to its accuracy under Section 83 and no importance can be attached to the recitals in private documents to the contrary.[38]

Even if a map or plan is made under the authority of Government if it is not made for a public purpose but for private purposes it does not come within the meaning of this section. Where the Government was in possession of a Mahal merely as a private proprietor, a map prepared by an officer in charge of the Mahal, it was held the accuracy could not be presumed under this section.[39] Where a map was prepared at the instance of collector as a holder of a Trust Estate, it was held Section 83 has no application as it was a private document.[40] Where a collector ordered survey and drawing of a map of the disputed area of a river bed, it was held that as the map was prepared for a specific purpose, it would neither come under Section 36 nor under Section 83.[41]

3. MAPS PREPARED FOR ANY CAUSE

The Privy Council held that no presumption as to accuracy can be drawn in regard to a map prepared in a suit showing the limits of a particular Mahal as it was not prepared under any authority of the Government nor was it published generally for public sale nor was it related to any matter of public or general interest. Such private map is not admissible in evidence against the persons who are not parties to the prior suit unless proved to be accurate.[42] The accuracy of private maps or maps prepared for any cause has to be proved by the person who prepared it.[43]

The sketch map prepared on the basis of the cadastral map is not admissible in evidence.[44]

4. CONSENT OR WAIVER BY PARTIES

Where both parties relied on a map or plan and neither party raised any objection about the proof of its accuracy, it was held that proof of it was waived and it would be admissible without proof.[45]

Presumption as to collection of laws and reports of decisions.

S. 84. The Court shall presume the genuineness of every book purporting to be printed or published under the authority of the Government of any country, and to contain any of the laws of that country, and of every book purporting to contain reports of decisions of the Courts of such country.

COMMENTS

1. PRINCIPLE

This section should be read along with Section 38, which makes relevant statements as to any law and rulings contained in officially printed books of any country. It dispenses with the proof of the genuineness of authorized books of any country containing laws and reports of decisions of courts. Section 57 authorizes the Courts to take judicial notice of the existence of all laws and statutes in India and in the United Kingdom. Section 74 recognizes statutory records to be public records. Section 78 lays down the method of proving the statute passed by the Legislature.

WIGMORE (Section 2151) says:—

The intolerable inconvenience of having to prove the genuineness of printed matter purporting to be published by the Government has led to general concession, by judicial decisions or by statute, that such purporting publications, at least when in the form of standard official documents constantly issued and referred to are assumed to be genuine.

The only effect of Section 38 and 84 read together is that the court may take judicial notice of a publication containing foreign law, if it is issued under the authority of the foreign government concerned, and may accept the law as set out in the publication as the law in force in the particular foreign country at the relevant time. But, such a publication can not be evidence, that what is contained in it, is the whole law, which can only be proved by calling an expert as provided by Section 45.[46]

The court has to give its reasons, after satisfying itself that it is necessary to consider the whole law of a foreign country for the decision of a case on hand and then call an expert to place the whole law of that country.[47]

So far as India is concerned the judicial decisions are being printed and published by the Government, as Indian Law reports under the India Law Reports Act 18 of 1875.

The report of a case in a newspaper is not within this section as the newspaper cannot be considered to be a book purporting to contain reports of decisions.[48]

Regarding the law of limitation which was made in Kota State prior to 1942, when the original record was not available, it was held that Hidayat Ghair Mansukhshuda, Singha Dawan, bearing Kota Coat of Arms, purporting to have been published under the authority of His Highness of Kota, should be presumed to be genuine, though it did not contain reference to the order of His Highness, as the presumption would be in favour of its validity.[49]

Presumption as to powers-of-attorney.

S. 85. The Court shall presume that every document purporting to be a power-of-attorney, and to have been executed before, and authenticated by, a Notary Public, or any Court, Judge, Magistrate, Indian Consul or Vice-Consul, or representative of the Central Government, was so executed and authenticated.

COMMENTS

1. PRINCIPLE AND SCOPE

This section deals with the presumption in respect of a power of attorney regarding its execution and authentication by a notary public, or any court, Judge, Magistrate, Indian Consul or vice consul or representative of the Central Government. The above named persons are the authorities before whom the power of attorney is to be executed, and who, would authenticate them. When a power of attorney is so executed and authenticated and tendered in evidence the court shall presume the due execution and authentication.

This section is an extension of a provision contained in the Registration Act, with reference to a power of attorney executed for the purpose of procuring the registration of conveyances or other instruments.

WHARTON defines the word 'power of attorney' as:—"A writing given and made by one person authorising another, who in such a case, is called the attorney of the person (or donee of the power), approving him to do any lawful act instead of that person, as to receive rents, debts, to make appearances and application in court, before an officer for registration and the like. It may be either general or special i.e., to do all acts or to do some particular act". This expression is not defined in the Evidence Act.

Power-of-attorney includes any instruments empowering a specified person to act for and in the name of the person executing it.[50]

The word 'notary public' is defined by WHARTON in his LAW LEXICON as follows:—"A 'notary public' is an officer who takes notes of anything which may concern the public; he attests deeds or writings to make them authentic in another country, but is principally employed in mercantile affairs, to make protests of bills of exchange, etc".

Under Section 138 of the Negotiable Instruments Act, 26 of 1881, the Central Government is authorised to appoint notaries public within any local area. Under Section 2(d) of the Notaries Act of 1952 any person can be appointed as a notary and the duties of the notary are given in Section 8 of the said Act.

This expression 'notary public' occurs in Section 78, Cl. (6) of this Act and in Section 33 of the Registration Act, 1908.

Under Section 69 of the Registration Act 1908, a Register of the power of attornies is to be maintained by the registering officer. Under Section 74(1)(iii) of the Evidence Act, an entry in that register is a public document forming the act or record of the act of a public officer in the discharge of a statutory duty imposed upon him, a certified copy of the entry in that register would be admissible under Section 76 read with Section 63(1) and it would be proof of the original entry by virtue of Section 65(e) of the Evidence Act. Such entry would also be relevant under Section 35 of the Evidence Act. But what weight is to be attached to such an entry would depend upon the accuracy of the abstract of the power of attorney.[51]

Section 85 is mandatory though it is not exhaustive. Under Section 57(6) of this Act the court shall take judicial notice of the seals of the Notary public.[52] Where the notary put the seal on the document a presumption under Section 57(6) can be raised regarding the genuineness of the seal of the said notary.[53]

The Supreme Court in Jugraj Singh v. Jaswant Singh[54] observed: "Where the power of attorney was presented for registration and the endorsement of notary public shows that it had been subscribed and sworn before him, there is a presumption that he must have satisfied himself in discharge of his official duties, that the person executing it is the proper person; that the fact that the registrar does not say so in his endorsement, that he has satisfied himself, is not material". In the above Supreme Court case[55] the vendor of the property was in U.S.A., and he executed the power of atttorney which was found to be not duly authenticated. On the basis of that power a sale deed was executed in India by the power of attorney agent. The vendor executed a second power of attorney duly authenticated ratifying the earlier power of attorney; it was held by the Supreme Court that the second power of attorney validates the transaction of sale and registration eventhough both were earlier to the second power of attorney; that such ratification relates back to the date of the act done and the agent is put in the same position as if he had authority to do it at that date; that the illegality of the registration was thus cured by the second power of attorney.

The Calcutta High Court observed: "Registration is a solemn act, to be performed in the presence of a competent official appointed to act as Registrar, whose duty is to attend the parties during the registration and see that the proper persons are present, are competent to act and are identified to his satisfaction and all things done before him in his official capacity and verified by his signature will be presumed to be done duly and to be in order. Of course it may be shown that a deliberate fraud upon him has been successfully committed; but this can only be on very much stronger evidence than is forthcoming here".[56]

As there is no prescribed or established form of the nature and manner of authentication by a notary public, the same has to be gathered from the tenor, facts and circumstances of the power of attorney and its authentication by a notary public.[57]

Two conditions have to be satisfied for applying the presumption under Section 85 in respect of the execution of a power of attorney:

(1) It must be executed before a notary public or any other person referred to in Section 85.

(2) It must be authenticated by the notary public or any person mentioned in Section 85. If one of the conditions is not satisfied Section 85 does not apply to raise any presumption in favour of that power of attorney.[58]

When a document purporting to be a power of attorney and to have been executed before, and authenticated by, a notary public is produced before a Court, it was held that an affidavit of identification that the person, purporting to make the power of attorney, was the person named therein, is unnecessary.[59]

Though there may not be any presumption under Section 85, in favour of a power of attorney, it does not follow that there is an opposite presumption that it has not been duly executed.[60]

B as a power of attorney agent of A executed a registered sale deed in respect of A's property in favour of C, C filed a suit to evict a tenant from the property and his suit was dismissed and it was confirmed by the appellate court as the power of attorney was found defective. During the pendency of the second appeal preferred by C a fresh pwoer of attorney duly executed by A and registered before the sub-Registrar validating all past transactions done by N, was filed in the second appeal. It was held that the second power of attorney is admissible in second appeal under Order XLI, Rule 27, C.P.C. without further proof and it must be taken to have cured the defect in the earlier power of attorney and validated the sale.[61]

The purpose of Sections 57(6) and 85 is to cut down recording of evidence. For such matters, like the due execution of a power of attorney in the present day of international commerce, there is no reason to limit the word 'notary public' in Section 85 or Section 57(6) to notaries appointed in India only. If the interpretation of the notary public is limited to notaries appointed in this country only it will become impossible to carry on commerce with foreign countries.[62]

The very purpose of drawing a presumption under Sections 57 and 85 of the Evidence Act, would be nullified if proof is to be had from the foreign country, whether a particular person who had attested the document as a notary of that country is in fact a duly appointed notary or not.[63]

A power of attorney in favour of a company's permanent delegate in Delhi was authenticated by a Judge of the foreign country. Its due execution and authentication was presumed.[64]

It was held by the Calcutta High Court that by reason of the absence of reciprocal arrangements between India and Pakistan regarding powers of attorney, it cannot be presumed in regard to a power of attorney executed and authenticated in Pakistan executed before and authenticated by a notary public within the meaning of this section.[65]

However, the Allahabad High Court held that in view of Section 2(d) and Section 3 of the Notaries Act 53 of 1952, Section 85 applies not only to notaries public as defined in the Notaries Act, but also to notaries public functioning in other countries; that documents authenticated before notaries public functioning in other countries (Pakistan) must be presumed to have been duly authenticated within Section 85.[66]

2. AUTHENTICATION

It was held that the authentication under this section is not merely attestation, but it means that the person authenticating has assured himself of the identity of the person who has signed the instrument as well as the fact of execution, it is for this reason that the presumption under this section, unless rebutted, stands and the document can be admitted in evidence as a document executed by the person alleged to have executed it without any further proof.[67]

No particular form of authentication by a notary public is given under Section 85. Notary public need not use the word 'authentication' in the attestation made by him on the document. Attestation by a notary public stating 'subscribed and sworn to before me' is valid authentication.[68] As there is no prescribed or established form of the nature and manner of authentication by a notary public, the same has to be gathered from the tenor, facts and circumstances of the power of attorney and its authentication by a notary public.[69] The execution and authentication of a document cannot be doubted merely because the document had not been drafted or typed out by the executant before the Notary Public.[70]

A witness does not need a power of attorney or any authority in writing from the party calling him as its witness to depose about certain facts before a Court which are within his special knowledge.[71]

3. PRESUMPTION AS TO AUTHENTICATION

Where there was thumb impression of the executant of the power of attorney and the Magistrate used a rubber stamp and put his signature on the basis of the identification made by an advocate, it was held that the presumption under secion 85 may operate in favour of the party relying on a document and to the prejudice of the party alleging that the document is not a genuine one; that for the purpose of such presumption to operate, the authentication must be clear, specific, decisive and benefit of any doubt; if there is the slightest doubt the Court must not rely on the presumption under Section 85.[72]

Though a presumption of execution and the authentication is drawn under Section 85, the document itself is not sufficient to prove the statements contained in it. The statements are to be proved like any other facts.[73]

COMMENTS

1. THE INFORMATION TECHNOLOGY ACT, 2000 PRESUMPTION AS TO DIGITAL SIGNATURE CERTIFICATES

The Court has to presume, unless contrary is proved that the information listed in a Digital Signature Certificate is correct but it does not apply to the information specified as subscriber information which has not been verified, if the certificate was accepted by the subscriber.

Presumption as to certified copies of foreign judicial records.

S. 86. The Court may presume that any document purporting to be a certified copy of any judicial record of any country not forming part of India or of Her Majesty's Dominions is genuine and accurate, if the document purports to be certified in any manner which is certified by any representative of the Central Government in or for such country to be the manner commonly in use in that country for the certification of copies of judicial records.

An officer who, with respect to any territory or place not forming part of India or Her Majesty's Dominions, is a Political Agent therefor, as defined in Section 3, clause (43), of the General Clauses Act, 1897, shall, for the purposes of this section, be deemed to be a representative of the Central Government in and for the country comprising that territory or place.

COMMENTS

1. PRINCIPLE AND SCOPE

This section deals with the presumption in respect of certified copy of any judicial record of a country, not forming part of India, or of the Dominions as genuine and accurate. The presumption contemplated under this section is permissive and a discretion is given to the Court whether to draw the presumption under the section or not, as the expression 'may presume' is used in this section. The definition of the expression "May Presume" is given in Section 4 of this Act.

The explanation in the last paragraph of this section was added by Section 4 of the Amending Act 5 of 1899, stating that an officer who is a Political Agent as defined in Section 3 of Cl. (43) of the General Clauses Act of 1897 of any territory or place not forming part of India or Her Majesty's Dominions; shall be deemed to be a representative of the Central Government in and for the country comprising the territory or place. The expression 'Political Agent' in Section 3(43) of the General Clauses Act is defined as:—"Political agent shall mean (a) in relation to any territory outside India, the principal officer by whatever name called, representing the Central Government in such territory; and (b) in relation to any territory within India to which the Act or Regulation containing the expression does not extend, any officer appointed by the Central Government to exercise all or any of the powers of a political agent under that Act or Regulation.

In a case under the Extradiction Act the expression 'Political Agent' was held to include as Assistant Political Agent.[80]

79. Inserted by the Information Technology Act, 2000, S. 92, Sch. II (w.e.f. 17-10-2000).

80. Hadibandhu Padhan v. Emperor, AIR 1946 Pat 196.

This section has to be read with Section 14, CPC., which states "The court shall presume, upon the production of any document purporting to be a certified copy of a foreign judgement, that such judgment was pronounced by a Court of a competent jurisdiction, unless the contrary appears on the record; but such presumption may be displaced by proving want of jurisdiction".

In the absence of a certificate referred to in this section a foreign judgment is not admissible in evidence as the provision in Section 86 is imperative and must be complied with.[81]

The admission of a judgment is not a condition precedent for raising a presumption under Section 86. The presumption may be drawn before the judgment is admitted.[82]

This section is not exhaustive of the modes of proof of foreign judicial records.[83]

Uncertified copies of a foreign judicial record may be proved by a competent witness deposing to the correctness of the copies.[84]

A certified copy of a foreign judicial record may be proved by a witness deposing that it was sealed and certified by the Registrar of a foreign court.[85]

Where a certified copy of a deposition given in a Court in Kutch State was tendered in evidence and when it was found that the certification was not done in the manner required by Section 76, it was held that it is not inadmissible. As Section 86 does not exclude other proof. Section 114 may be applied for drawing the presumption that a copy is a correct copy of the record of the deposition.[86]

It was held that if the presumption is not available under one section, it can still be drawn under another section of the Evidence Act if available. It all depends upon the circumstances available in a case as applicable to a particular document.[87]

If a copy of a foreign judicial record purports to be certified in a given way, the Court may presume it to be genuine and accurate. It, however, does not exclude proof, for, under Sections 65 and 66, secondary evidence may be given of public documents, without notice to the adverse party, when the person in possession of documents is out of the reach of, or not subject to, the process of the court.[88]

Presumption as to books, maps and charts.

S. 87. The Court may presume that any book to which it may refer for information on matters of public or general interest, and that any published map or chart, the statements of which are relevant facts and which is produced for its inspection, was written and published by the person and at the time and place, by whom or at which it purports to have been written or published.

COMMENTS

This section deals with the presumption in regard to books containing information on matters of public and general interest and also in respect of statements in any published map or chart. The presumption is only in respect of the authorship, time and place, but not with regard to the accuracy of the facts contained in such book, map, or chart.[89]

A map is nothing but statement of the maker thereof regarding the state of configuration of a particular site and objects standing thereon, by lines and pictorial representations, instead of by words of mouth, and admitting such a map in evidence without calling the maker thereof is admitting statements by a third party who is not called as witness and amounts to admitting hearsay evidence. So mere proof of the map by itself is only proof of the fact of the preparation of the map and apart from independent proof about the correctness of its contents it can not be said to have any bearing on the matters in issue and cannot be admitted into evidence unless shown to be admissible under any section of this Act. But a map and a chitta prepared under the orders of the defendants and filed along with collection papers showing collection on basis of the map and the chitta were held to be rightly admitted in evidence under Section 13.[90]

For the proper understanding of the scope of this section reference may be made to Sections 36, 57, 83, 90 and 114 of the Evidence Act. Section 36 states, when the statements of facts are made in a published map or chart generally offered for public sale, or when they are made under the authority of the Government, they would be relevant if such statements are of facts in issue or of relevant facts. Section 57(13) says that in regard to matters of public history, literature, science or art the court may resort for its aid to appropriate books and documents for reference. Section 83 says that the court shall presume the accuracy of the maps and plans purporting to be made by the authority of the Central or State Government, but not private plans or plans made for any particular purpose. Section 90 says that if it is an ancient document of over 30 years and produced from a proper custody the court may presume that the signature and every other part of the document purporting to be in the handwriting of a person is in his handwriting and that it was duly attested and executed. That section is applicable to a map or a plan which is also a document. Under Section 114 there a general presumption about the existence of any fact which is likely to have happened.

Where a charitable society in England published a pamphlet on schizophrenia for collecting funds to give treatment to diseased it was held as the authorship of the pamphlet was not established, it can not be treated as an authoritative pamphlet.[91]

The Privy Council in Martand Rao v. Malharao[92] held that the opinions expressed in the official reports should not be treated as conclusive in respect of matters requiring judicial determination but there cannot be any objection in referring to the reports for purpose of gathering historical facts which are not in issue.[93]

2. MAPS AND CHARTS

Though great weight may be attached to the accuracy of the survey maps, they are not conclusive, but in the absence of evidence to the contrary, they would be presumed to be accurate.[94]

Regarding revenue survey maps, the Privy Council held that as the revenue has to be conducted by a public officer in the discharge of his statutory duty and as he has to give opportunity to all persons interested so as to enable them to make their claims and produce evidence in support of their claims, the maps prepared after due enquiry are to be presumed to be correct unless they are shown to be wrong.[95]

The accuracy as to the information contained in a map must depend upon the source from which the information is obtained.[96]

Presumption as to telegraphic messages.

S. 88. The Court may presume that a message, forwarded from a telegraph office to the person to whom such message purports to be addressed, corresponds with a message delivered for transmission at the office from which the message purports to be sent; but the Court shall not make any presumption as to the person by whom such message was delivered for transmission.

COMMENTS

1. PRINCIPLE AND SCOPE

This section allows the Court to presume that a message forwarded from a telegraph office to a person corresponds with the message delivered for transmission and the same was delivered to the addressee, but there is no presumption as to the person by whom the message was sent or delivered for transmission. The presumption is based on the principle that official acts are regularly performed.

This section enables the court to accept the hearsay statement as evidence of the identity of the message delivered with that handed in.

The presumption under this section is available only if it is proved that the message has been delivered to the person to whom the message is addressed.[1]

In the absence of such evidence the telegram cannot be held to have been proved. A telegram is primary evidence of the fact that the same was delivered to the assessee on the date indicated therein.[2]

The presumption under this section is only with reference to the message that is transmitted to the addressee from the telegraph office. The last portion of the section is mandatory and the court shall not make any presumption as to the person by whom such message was delivered for transmission.[3]

The Supreme Court held: "It is true that under Section 88 there is a presumption only that the message received by the addressee corresponds with the message delivered for transmission at the office of origin. There is no presumption as to the person who delivered such a message for transmission. But proof of authorship of the message need not be direct and may be circumstantial. The contents of the message received in the context of the chain of correspondence, may well furnish proof of the authorship of the message at the dispatching end".[4]

Under Section 88 the presumption is limited to what is expressively provided in the section. The form handed over into the post office by the sender and not the form delivered by the post office to the addressee, is the original of the telegram. Either the original must be produced by an official from the post office concerned or proof of its destruction given before a copy can be admitted as secondary evidence.[5]

Where a sanction order for prosecution was communicated by a telegram from a Government Office, it was held that the telegram must be proved to have emanated from the Government Office as there is no presumption under Section 88 as to the person by whom such message was delivered for transmission.[6]

Where a party sent a telegram to a Court stating that he is ill and prayed for postponement of the case, it was held that the telegram is no evidence as there is no presumption under Section 88 as to the person who sent it and when the case was pending for a number of years due to dilatory conduct of that party the court is justified in not acting upon on the telegram.[7]

Where the original message is not proved to be in the handwriting of an alleged person, Section 88 is a bar for presuming that he is the sender of the message.[8]

Where there is no evidence regarding the signature appearing on the telegram showing the identity., the telegram cannot be presumed to have been sent by the accused.[9]

A telegram was sent by the police in South Africa to the Police in Bombay stating that certain bills of exchange were stolen on which basis Bombay police started their investigation. The Bombay High Court held that the telegraph office makes no enquiries and is in no way responsible regarding the identity of the person who delivers for transmission and much less responsible for its contents. A reasonable presumption under Section 114 of the Evidence Act can be drawn that the telegram emanated from South Africa, and so it cannot be rendered inadmissible under Section 88, if in reply to the telegram a reply is sent to the sender and is acknowledged by another telegram from the sender.[10] The contents of the telegram are not evidence of the facts stated therein.[11] The presumption under this section applicable to telegraph messages would also apply to radio messages.[12] Where an advocate conveyed a notice to quit through a phonogram, it was held that it was not a valid notice; as the appearance of the name of the advocate on the phonogram was of no importance, unless it is proved.[13]

The presumption arises when the original telegram which was destroyed, was delivered to the addressee mentioned therein, especially when the opposite party fails to produce any evidence by way of rebuttal.[14]

However, the contents of the message in a telegram in the context of a chain of correspondence may furnish proof of authorship.[15]

Presumption as to electronic messages.

COMMENTS

1. THE INFORMATION TECHNOLOGY ACT, 2000 PRESUMPTION AS TO ELECTRONIC MESSAGES

The Section 88A, inserted by the said Act, provides that the Court may presume that an electronic message forwarded by the originator through an electronic mail server to the addressee corresponds with the message as fed into his computer for transmission but there shall be no presumption as to the person by whom such matter was sent.

The explanation says that the terms "addressee" and "originator" will have the same meeting as is assigned to them in clauses (b) and (za) of sub-section 1 of S. 2 of I.T. Act.

COMMENTS

1. PRINCIPLE AND SCOPE

This section states that when a document is called for from any person and he does not produce it after proper notice to produce it the Court shall presume that the document was duly attested, stamped, and executed. This section is based on the principle that no one shall be allowed to take advantage of his own wrong.

This section is based on the principle of necessity also.[17]

If it is shown that a document is in the person's possession or power and despite notice given to him to produce the document he does not produce it, the conduct of the party justifies an inference to be drawn against him and in that case the principle of necessity is invoked and the court is authorised to presume that the document which has not been produced must have been properly attested, stamped and executed in the manner required by law.[18]

In Section 65, it is stated that secondary evidence may be given of the existence, condition or contents of a document in possession of any person legally bound to produce it and when, after the notice mentioned in Section 66 such person does not produce it. Under Section 65 such notice to produce the document as is prescribed by law is to be given. Order XVI, Rule 6 of CPC of 1908 provides for issuing or serving notice on the opposite party. If such proceedure is followed for production of a document from a person and if he does not produce it then Section 89 would come into play and the court shall presume that the document so required was duly attested, stamped and executed in the manner prescribed by law.[19]

Though the section does not refer to the person who is called to produce the document, it is obvious that it is restricted to cases where the notice is given to a party and will not apply to a document which is in the possession of a stranger who refuses to produce it though summoned to do so. The presumption as to due execution, attestation, and stamping cannot arise in favour of a party, where notice to produce the document has not been given to the opposite party.[20]

The condition precedent for the application of Section 89 is that the original document must have been called and has not been produced after a notice was given to produce it. These conditions suggest that the statutory presumption arises under Section 89 in all cases which fall under Section 65(a) and Section 66 of the Evidence Act. Once a presumption is drawn under Section 89 it can not be easily rebutted by the production of the original document at a later stage.[21]

When the plaintiff's allegation that a document was in defendant's possession is found to be correct, the defendant without producing the document cannot be allowed to contend that it was not stamped according to law.[22]

Once the plaintiff execuses himself from the production of the original documents on the plea that they are not traced or are lost, the question of giving notice for production does not arise.[23]

The presumption under this section would not arise in respect of proper stamping of the document when it is admitted that the original document was unstamped.[24]

Where a document is shown to have remained unstamped for some time after its execution the party who relies on it must prove that it is duly stamped.

Before drawing any presumption under this section, it must be proved that the documents exist and have been in possession of the opposite party.[25]

When a thirty years old registered gift deed was called for by issue of notice and was not produced, it was held the secondary evidnece of the original deed can be given by production of a certified copy and it is admissible under Section 65-A, and a presumption also can be drawn that it was duly executed, attested and stamped under Section 89. In view of Section 60(2) of the Registration Act, it can also be held that the executant admitted the execution of the deed before the Registrar.[26]

When the plaintiff filed a suit for redemption of a usufructuary mortgage and it was not disputed that the record of proceedings wherein a compromise petition bearing a stamp of Re. 1 was filed, was destroyed in the Mutiny, and when the plaintiff wanted to rely on a certified copy of the compromise petition mentioning the mortgage deed the defendants raised an objection that the contract was not enforceable as the document was not properly stamped, it was held that it may be presumed that the officer before whom the original mortgage deed was presented satisfied himself that it was properly stamped, and so a presumption can be drawn under this section.[27]

2. BURDEN OF PROOF

It is true that the onus of proving the fact that the document in question is in the possession or in the power of the opponent is initially on the party seeking to ask for permission to lead secondary evidence, but in the case of a registered mortgage, in the ordinary course, the deed of mortgage would be with the mortgagee and as soon as it is shown that the execution of the mortgage was admitted by the executant before the Sub-Registrar, the mortgagee or his heirs would be required to lead some evidence to show that the document was not with them nor was it in their power.[28]

There is no presumption under this section as to the contents of the document though under Section 114, it can be presumed that the contents are not favourable to the party who withholds the document.

Presumption as to documents thirty years old.

S. 90. Where any document, purporting or proved to be thirty years old, is produced from any custody which the Court in the particular case considers proper, the Court may presume that the signature and every other part of such document, which purports to be in the handwriting of any particular person, is in that person's handwriting, and, in the case of a document executed or attested, that it was duly executed and attested by the persons by whom it purports to be executed and attested.

Explanation.*—Documents are said to be in proper custody if they are in the place in which, and under the care of the person with whom they would naturally be; but no custody is improper if it is proved to have had a legitimate origin, or if the circumstances of the particular case are such as to render such an origin probable.

This explanation applies also to Section 81.

COMMENTS

1. PRINCIPLE

This section is based on the principle of necessity and convenience.

The object of this section is not to make it too difficult for persons relying upon ancient documents to utilize those documents in proving their case. It is intended to do away with the insuperable difficulty of proving the handwriting, execution, and attestation of documents in the ordinary way after the lapse of many years.

When a document is or purports to be more than thirty years old, if it be produced from what the court considers to be proper custody, it may be presumed (a) that the signature and every other part of such document, which purports to be in the handwriting of any particular person, is in that person's handwriting, and (b) that it was duly executed and attested by the person by whom it purports to be executed and attested.[1] It is not necessary that the signatures of the attesting witnesses or of the scribe be proved, for if everything was proved there would be no need to presume anything.[2]

Documents of 30 years old produced from proper custody could be read as evidence without formal proof as a presumption can be drawn about its execution by the person by whom it purports to have been executed.[3] The principle underlying this section is that if a private document 30 years old or more, is produced from proper custody and is on its face free from suspicion the court may presume that it has been signed or written by the person whose signature it bears or in whose handwriting it purports to be and it has been duly attested and executed, if it purports so to be. In other words documents of 30 years old prove themselves. It is extremely difficult sometimes and impossible to prove the handwriting or signature or execution of ancient documents. It is therefore presumed that all persons acquainted with the execution of documents, if any, are dead and so the proof of those facts is dispensed with. Thus the presumption relates to the execution of the documents, i.e., signature, attestation etc., but not to the truth of its contents.[4]

2. PURPORTING OR PROVED TO BE THIRTY YEARS OLD

At least prima facie proof is necessary to show that the document is thirty years old, for raising the presumption under Section 90, though it is a rebuttable presumption.[5] Where the party opposing the document disproves it by convincing evidence, the Court is bound to call the party relying on it to prove it but when the opposite party fails to disprove it, its validity would be presumed.[6]

It is not necessary in every case to prove that the document is 30 years old if intrinsically it purports to be that old.[7] Where the fact of execution is not in dispute in respect of deed more than 30 years, no evidence is necessary to prove its genuineness.[8] No presumption can be raised where the document is undated.[9]

Where a mere look at the document shows that it is not free from suspicion though it purports to be more than 30 years old, the court must consider the evidence giving an opportunity to both parties before raising any presumption under Section 90.[10]

The rule embodied in Section 90 is based on the impossibility of obtaining living testimony to the signing or the handwriting of a document. It logically follows that the time should run from the date which the document bears whether it is a will or any other document. Therefore the period of presumption begins from the date of execution (in the case of Wills it runs not from the date of death of the testator on which date the will become operative).[11]

The period of thirty years is to be reckoned not from the date upon which the document is filed in court, but from the date on which, it having been tendered in evidence, its genuineness or otherwise becomes the subject of proof.[12] The period of 30 years is to be commuted from the date of its execution to the date on which it was sought to be put into evidence.[13]

A document dated August 3, 1888, was produced in Court of December 19, 1917, and its genuineness was not called in question up to August 12, 1918, when the first Court gave its judgment. It was only when the case came up to the appellate court that the defendants took objection that the document had not been proved. It was held that the period of thirty years should be reckoned from August 12, 1918, when the trial court gave its decision, and the due execution of the document could therefore be presumed.[14] In a case, the great-grandson of Mahatma Gandhi addressed a letter to the Chief Justice of India for securing the urn containing the ashes of his great-grand father lying in a safe deposit locker in the SBI, Cuttack so as to enable him to complete the last rites as per Hindu religious practice. The SBI confirmed its existence in the locker. The entry in safe deposit register showed that it was deposited by the then Secretary to the Chief Minister of Orissa on 29-11-1950. It was held that the entry in the safe deposit register cannot be doubted since it was an old entry of 1950 made in regular course of the business of the Bank.[15] In absence of any suspicious circumstances, the presumption that the document, executed 30 years before, proves itself, arises.[16]

A 30 year old unregistered sale-deed, by invoking this section, cannot be read for collateral purpose of the possession of the plaintiff which was not otherwise proved.[17] Where the document purported to be more than 30 years old was unregistered and its attestors were not examined, Section 90 could not be invoked for the validity of its execution on the ground of the evidence of the person who had seen the document being executed.[18]

Where the finding of fact was based on a document which was not more than 30 years old, the finding was held to be based on no evidence i.e. on no admissible evidence and was vitiated by error of law and could be interfered with.[19]

3. PROPER CUSTODY—EXPLANATION

"The proper custody of a document means its deposit with a person and in a place, where, if authentic, it might naturally and reasonably be expected to be found".[20] Where more than 30 year old document, bearing signatures of the executants and not looking ex facie suspicious was produced by the son of one of the executants at the first instance, the custody being proper, presumption could be drawn in favour of the document.[21]

'Proper custody' means the custody of any person so connected with the deed that his possession of it does not excite any suspicion or fraud.[22] It is not necessary that the document should be found in the best and the most proper place of deposit. The section insists only on a satisfactory account of the origin of the custody, and not on the history of the continuance. Possibly the origin of the custody was alone regarded as material because it is intelligible that ancient documents may be overlooked and left undisturbed notwithstanding a transfer of old, or creation of new, interests.[23] In illustrations (a) and (b) the documents are produced from their natural place of custody, in (c) A's custody is proper under the circumstances. The provisions of the section read with the Explanation insist on a satisfactory account of the origin of the possession being given by the party relying upon the documents. The custody, might not be in the strictest sense legal custody, but, whether it originated in right or wrong, the origin must be explained. The court must, therefore, examine the surrounding circumstances tending to establish the connection of the party producing the document with the person with whom the documents should naturally have been.[24]

It was held by the Bombay High Court that proper custody is custody proved to have had a legitimate origin or an origin the legitimacy of which the circumstances of the case render probable.[25] The presumption being based on the rule of expendiency, unless the surrounding circumstances satisfied the court that the document was produced from proper custody it would be unsound to admit it.[26] Where a party cannot properly explain how a document produced by him came into his possession, the custody of the document cannot be said to be clearly proved.[27]

When a person stated on oath that the document had been entrusted to him by the vendee of the property for the purpose of a certain case in court, it was held that the custody of such document cannot be said to be improper, and the court can raise a presumption as to its genuineness under Section 90.[28]

The factum of proper custody is not a matter for presumption but ought to be satisfactorily proved by adducing evidence aliunde to show that the document was produced from proper custody or by showing that the person who produced it was the depository of the document in question.[29]

The origin of the custody has to be explained by the person producing the document if he happens to be a person who is not normally supposed to have custody of the document. It is enough if the person is so connected with it that he may reasonably be supposed to be in possession of it.[30]

Where an order under the Rent Control Act fixing fair rent was produced by A and the document is thirty years old and purports to have been sent to A's father it was held that A's custody has to be considered proper and a presumption can be raised under Section 90.[31] Where a private document (Anumathipatra) was deposited a few days after the death of the executant in the collector's office and 54 years later it was produced from that office it was held that it was from proper custody.[32] Where thirty-year old document which is a compromise petition containing the thumb mark and signatures of the parties to the petition, the scribe and attestors is produced from the record room, where it has been kept as a part of the decree, the compromise petition can be taken as genuine and duly executed under Section 90 as it is produced from proper custody.[33] A sixty year old properly executed will produced by the only son of the testator was presumed to be genuine as it came from lawful custody. No separate proof was required to prove its execution.[34]

Where a private partition chitta more than 30 years old was produced from the record keeper through an officer of the collectorate, it was held that the officer was not the proper custodian of partition papers of private individuals and no presumption can be drawn.[35]

It must be shown that such a document was filed for adjudication of some matters in such a court.[36]

The rule is to compel the party who relies upon a document to show that it comes from proper custody in which it would naturally be expected to be kept when the concerned party did not adduce evidence that he was the depository of the document (will) in question. Section 90 would not be attracted.[37]

It is for the Court to decide in each case whether the custody from which the document is produced is or is not proper.[38]

When the old documents are produced as instance of particular customs and not as a foundation of title, such documents may be admitted in evidence irrespective of the fact whether they come from proper custody or not.[39]

4. DOCUMENT : SEE COMMENTARY UNDER SECTION 3

The section also applies to accounts[40] and to books of account[41] as well as to all other documents public or private.

However, it was held by the Supreme Court that loose papers of accounts cannot have the same probative force of account books which are regularly kept in the course of business.[42]

5. PRESUMPTION IS AS TO SIGNATURE IN A DOCUMENT

Where the signature of a particular person is not in question or sought to be established, Section 90 does not apply.[43] The presumption under Section 90 applies only to signatures and handwriting.[44] The presumption applies only if the document in question purports to have been 'signed' by somebody or if it purports to be in the handwriting of somebody.[45] Where a document was signed by one H for D, it was held the presumption will be only in respect of the signature of H and not in respect of execution of the document by D.[46] The presumption permitted by this section in the case of a document purporting to be thirty years old, that it was duly executed by the party by whom it is purported to be executed, includes the presumption that when the signature of the executant purports to have been made by the pen of the scribe, the latter was duly authorised to sign for him.[47]

The Presumption under Section 90 can be raised only if the document itself shows in whose handwriting the contents are. This section does not lay down that there is any presumption regarding an anonymous document, the writer of which is not known. Where an ancient document was not signed by the person who wrote it and there was no material upon which one can say that a particular person had written it and there was only a general statement that the document was kept in the family records, it was held that the document cannot be taken to be proved and no presumption sender this section can be drawn.[48]

Signature includes a mark, a mark being a sort of symbolic writing. The presumption under Section 90 when it arises in favour of a party extends to the thumb marks put on the document indicating that the document was signed by the executant by way of symbolic writing which has to be taken as a signature in the absence of proof to the contrary.[49]

Where at the usual place of executant's signature the name of the illiterate executant was written along with the words 'Nisani' and there is no mark or thumb mark impression of the executant; it was held that the document cannot be said to have been executed by him.[50]

The section makes no provision for any presumption in regard to seals nor can a seal be regarded as a signature within the definition of the word contained in the General Clauses Act.[51] No presumption can be drawn when the document does not bear any signature but only a seal, as the seal does not amount to a signature.[52] It was held that in the case of imaginary persons as in the case of Inam grants there can be no question of signature or handwriting and the presumption under Section 90 would not apply.[53]

6. PRESUMPTION REGARDING WILLS

Presumption under this section extends to testamentary documents. A will purporting to be thirty years old and produced from proper custody may be presumed to have been duly attested and executed. The court must, however, act with extreme caution and utmost circumspection.[54] The presumption under Section 90 can be drawn regarding actual execution and attestation of the will more than 30 years old and produced from proper custody.[55] Section 90 is applicable to wills produced in courts of probate and it is permissible to draw presumption that a will coming from proper custody and more than 30 years old was duly executed and attested.[56] Where a will was executed in 1917[57] a presumptiuon of ancient document under Section 90 was held available in the year 1950.

In a case based upon a will, the propounder or the plaintiff must plead that the document was properly executed and duly attested and was the last will of the testator. Where the plaintiff has not pleaded that the will was duly attested, there will be no question of presuming attestation under Section 90. Assuming that the presumption could be made for its valid attestation, the presumption could not extend to the will being the last will of the testator.[58]

Where a registered will over thirty years old was produced from proper custody it was held that it should be presumed as a valid and genuine document. Where all parties to the will except the beneficiary are dead and the signature of the scribe has been identified by his fellow document writer who was acquainted with the signature, it cannot be said that the will has not been proved, in the absence of evidence in rebuttal.[59] Where a will more than thirty years old was produced from proper custody it was held that the presumption that it was duly executed and attested, which could be drawn under S. 90 of the Indian Evidence Act, extended to the testamentary capacity of the testator. In the absence of any evidence as to the state of his mind, proof that he had executed a will rational in character in the presence of witnesses must lead to a presumption that he was of sound disposing mind. This presumption, which can be justified under the express provisions of Section 90 of the Evidence Act, since a will cannot be said to be "duly" executed by a person who was not competent to execute it, is fortified under the provisions of Section 114 of the Evidence Act, since it is likely that a man who performs a solemn and rational act in the presence of witnesses is sane and understands what he is about.[60]

The presumption under this section can be raised only with regard to the original document if produced before the court. It does not apply to a certified copy when the original document is not before the court. The section requires the production to the Court of the particular document in regard to which the court may make the statutory presumption.

In Basant Singh v. Brij Raj Saran Singh[61] an appeal arising from the decision in Brij Raj Saran Singh v. Basant Singh[62] it was held by the Privy Council that if the document produced is a copy and was admitted under Section 65 as secondary evidence, and if the document is over thirty years old and produced from proper custody, then the signatures authenticating the copy may be presumed to be genuine, but the production of the copy is not sufficient to justify the presumption of the execution of the original under Section 90. The Privy Council overruled earlier decisions to the contrary.[63]

The Supreme Court observed "The presumption enacted in Section 90 can be raised with reference to original documents and not to copies thereof."[64] Further it was held that if the document purports to be signed by the agent of the person against whom the presumption is sought to be raised and there is no proof that he was an agent, Section 90 does not authorise the raising of a presumption as to the existence of authority on the part of the agent to represent that person.[65]

The above decisions of the Privy Council and the Supreme Court were followed in[66] Kalidindi Venkata Subbaraju. The court held that the production of a copy does not warrant the presumptions of due execution of the original. Supreme Court, however, came to the conclusion that apart from such presumption there was evidence from which the High Court could conclude that the will was duly executed and attested and that the executant was in a sound disposing state of mind. They, therefore, observed that the effect of the certified copy of the will having been rightly admitted, was as if the contents of the will were before the court. In support of this, they relied on the decision of the Privy Council in Seethayya v. P. Subrahmanya Somayajulu[67]. In that case the original grant which was 250 years old was lost. But a copy of it was produced from proper custody. It bore the endorsement of the predecessors of the respondents. "Originals have been retained by us and copies have been filed in 1858". The Privy Council held the copy was admissible as secondary evidence of the terms of the grant under Section 65 of the Act and the said endorsement authenticating the copy was evidence as a statement by a deceased person in a document relating to a relevant fact and also as an admission of the respondent's predecessors. The Privy Council also held that the copy being admissible as secondary evidence of the terms of the original grant, the court could proceed upon the footing that the terms of the said grant were before it.[68]

8. CERTIFIED COPIES

Where the plaintiff in a suit for redemption of mortgage relied on a certified copy of a statement made in the mutation proceedings for the purpose of showing the acknowledgement of the mortgage, and the original was not produced for examination, it was held by the Supreme Court that the certified copy could not serve as an acknowledgement of mortgage, and no presumption can be extended to certified copies under Section 90[69] unless foundation is laid for admission of secondary evidence under Section 63.[70]

An entry in the register of a document writer as to the contents of the will was held to be a summarised copy of the will and howsoever old the register may be the presumption of the execution or attestation of the alleged document cannot arise.[71]

It was held that when the original Church Register was not produced and no explanation was offered for its non-production, the copies of the entries therein are not admissible.[72]

In the case of a certified copy of a registered document, Section 60(2) of a Registration Act is only confined to the endorsements made by the Registering Officer under Section 58 of that Act which provides for raising a statutory presumption or inference in respect of the said endorsements alone. Under Section 90, the presumption cannot be made as to the signature, handwriting, execution or attestation of the original document. Though the signature authenticating the copy may be presumed to be genuine under Section 90, the party who relies on it has to prove the execution of the original document, and also attestation if the document requires attestation under law.[73]

Where the certified copy shows that the original contained an endorsement by the Sub-Registrar under Section 60 of the Registration Act, it was held that it can be taken as the evidence of facts that the original document contained the testator's or executant's signature.[74]

Where the original was lost and if it is so proved, the certified copy is admissible to prove the contents of the original but not the execution of the original.[75]

In the case of registration copies of documents what is applicable is not Section 90 but Section 57(5) of the Registration Act.[76]

Where the document was a registered one, though mere registration may not by itself constitute sufficient proof of the execution of the document, in view of Sections 57 and 60 of the Registration Act, the certified copy and the certificate issued by the Registrar would constitute sufficient evidence to prove the contents of the document and also, to some extent, an evidence of execution of the document. It may be that proof of admission of execution before the Registrar may not satisfy completely the requirements of Section 67 of the Evidence Act which requires that the signature of the executant must be proved to be in his handwriting. If apart from the admission incorporated in the certificate of the registrar under Section 60(2) of the Registration Act, there is other evidence to corroborate the admission, the execution of the document can be considered as proved.[77]

When the document purporting to be more than 30 years old is a registered one and it is produced from proper custody, the presumption under Section 90 can be drawn by the court, as to the purported signatures of the executants and execution by them and its due attestation.[78]

Where a registered gift deed of immovable property of about 50 years old was produced in evidence, it was held, it was a valid document duly registered and the burden is on the person challenging its validity to prove that it was a fraud on registration as a non-existent Jamun tree was included therein only to attract the jurisdiction of the Sub-Registrar. This is not a case of a presumption of due execution or attestation or of the signature of the executant and does not fall within Section 90. The reference to Section 90 in the head note is misleading as no reference to that section is made in the judgment.[79]

Where uncertified copies of ancient village accounts not kept in proper custody are produced, no presumption can be raised.[80]

Where an acknowledgement made in a deposition during the settlement enquiry was produced from proper custody and it is thirty years old, presumption can be drawn.[81]

Section 90 does not involve any presumption that the contents of the document are true or that it had been acted upon as such facts have to be proved by adducing proper and relevant evidence.[82]Though they may constitute an estoppel against the executant and will be relevant against him under Sections 17, 18, 21 and 32(2).[83]

Section 90 does not deal with any presumption about the legal effect of a document. Where a Hindu widow alienated the property and execution of the document was admitted by her, it was held no assistance can be derived from Section 90 as to the question whether she alienated only her life estate or made an absolute alienation.[84]

When all those who knew about an alienation made by a limited owner 39 years ago and could explain the circumstances are dead, it was held that the presumption arises that the alienation was for legal necessity. This presumption is not one coming under Section 90 and it is submitted that reference to Section 90 in the head note of the report is misleading, when there is no reference at all to that section in the judgement.[85]

Where a person executed a document on behalf of another, the authority of the executant to execute the document cannot be presumed under this section[86]; but when a grant has been in force for a long period unchallenged by the affected persons, the requisite authority to execute can be presumed.[87]

Where a person claiming to be Guzaredar claiming maintenance allowance under Section 10 Bhopal Abolition of Jagirs and Land Reformation Act and Gujaredar claimed to be in possession of a certain village in lieu of maintenance till the date of conversion of Jagirs into Mansab and produced documents over 30 years old from proper custody, it was held that the evidence coupled with the documents would give rise to the presumption under Section 90 and it was sufficient to prove that he was Guzaredar and was in possession of the village in lieu of maintenance.[88]

There can, however, be no presumption as to who the person who executed the document was and what authority he had to execute the document,[89] and whether he had the requisite authority,[90] or whether the contents of the document are true,[91] or that the document has the legal effect that it purports to have.[92]

When a document is tendered in proof of relationship the document must be relevant under Section 32(5), before raising the presumption under Section 90.[93]

Where a confession contained a certificate of a memorandum at its foot as required by Section 164, Cr. P.C., it was held that a presumption arises under Section 90 that all the necessary formalities have been duly complied with and the statements contained in the memorandum are true and correct.[94] It is submitted that the reference to Section 90 for raising the presumption that all formalities were complied with is not correct. The conclusion may however be justified under Section 114 of the Act.

9. MAY PRESUME

The expression 'may presume' in this section indicates that the court has the discretion either to draw the presumption under this section or not.[95] The expression means that the trial court has a discretion either to presume a fact as proved or to call for proof of it[96] The presumption is discretionary and not obligatory. Even if the elements mentioned in the section are satisfied, the court may require the document to be proved in the ordinary manner. It is necessary for the court to consider the evidence external and internal of the document in order to enable it to decide whether in any particular case it should or should not presume proper signature and execution. The court may, but is not bound to, make the presumption merely because of the alleged age of the document.[97]

The presumption allowed by this section is not a presumption which the court is bound to make, and the Court may require the document to be proved in the ordinary manner[98]. It is in the discretion of a court whether it will raise the presumption in favour of a document for which this section provides, but this discretion is not to be exercised arbitrarily; it must be governed by principles, which are consonant with law and justice. And while on the one hand great care is requisite in applying the pre-sumption, on the other hand it is clear that very great injustice may be perpetrated, if an ancient document coming from proper custody is rejected by a Court capriciously or for inadequate reasons. "Because a document purports to be an ancient document and to come from proper custody, it does not, therefore, follow that its genuineness, is to be assumed. If there are reasonable grounds for suspecting its genuineness and the party relying upon it fails to satisfy the court of its due execution, there is an end of it. But if no such grounds exist, and it satisfies the conditions prescribed by S. 90 of the Indian Evidence Act, then proof of execution is dispensed with, and it is to be dealt with on the same footing as any other genuine instrument. If the authority or the title of the executant, for example, be not questioned, then, effect is to be given to it as though he had the requisite authority or title. If either be questioned, then of course the person on whom the burden of proof lies must adduce evidence to satisfy the court on the point, or he fails. When the genuineness of a document purporting to be an ancient document is put in issue, it appears to have been sometimes thought that any presumption in its favour is thereby excluded. But this would be to deprive the party producing it of the benefits of the presumption precisely in the circumstances in which he most stands in need of its aid. And there seems to be no difference in principle between cases in which due execution is traversed without more, that is, in which the party relying on the document is put to proof of it, and those in which it is alleged that the document is a forgery, except that in the latter case, the suspicion of the court may be aroused by the nature of the plea. But in the one case, as in the other, the presumption merely takes the place of the evidence which would, where modern document is concerned, be necessary for the purpose of proving due execution. The court may decline to raise the presumption, in which case the party producing the document must fail, unless he is provided with evidence in support of it. But where the court thinks proper to raise the presumption, it must be met and rebutted in the same way as direct evidence of the execution in the case of a modern document. The proper rule is....well stated by Mr. Taylor.....He says (page 587, 8th Edition)—'An ancient deed, which has nothing suspicious about it, is presumed to be genuine without express proof, the witness being presumed dead, and if found in proper custody and corroborated by evidence of ancient or modern corresponding enjoyment or by the equivalent or explanatory proof, it will be presumed to have constituted part of the actual transfer of the property therein mentioned, because this is the usual course of such transaction."[1] Before a court is justified in making a presumption in favour of the genuineness of an ancient document it should be satisfied aliunde that there is good ground for accepting it as a true document.[2] If there are circumstances in the case which throw great doubt on the genuineness of a document more than thirty years old, even if it is produced from proper custody, the court may exercise its discretion by not admitting that document in evidence without formal proof, and reject it when no such proof is given.[3]

This section does not lay down that the court must always come to the conclusion that a document more than 30 years old and produced from proper custody is genuine.[4]

The language used in Section 90 indicates that the presumption raised is a permissive one. It is not obligatory on a court to raise the presumption, it is a matter of judicial discretion whether the court will make a presumption or call upon the party to offer other proof.[5] The mere fact that a party has led evidence to prove the execution of a document which is 30 years old or requested the court only towards the close of the trial to raise the presumption under Section 90 regarding the genuineness of a document, does not debar the court from raising the presumption.[6]

A party normally expects that a presumption would be drawn in its favour when the conditions under Section 90 are fulfilled. If the Court rules otherwise, then it is duty bound to give opportunity to the party to prove the execution of the document by direct evidence, if any. However, the party leading the direct evidence regarding the execution of the document is not permitted to rely on the presumption under this section.[7]

10. COURT MUST ACT WITH CAUTION

The rule of presumption of the genuineness of ancient document must be applied with exceeding caution and where circumstances throw suspicion on genuineness of the document, no presumption under Section 90 can be drawn. Although a mere recital in an ancient deed by itself cannot be proof of payment of consideration, still where the transaction happens to be an old one any little evidence in support of it would be enough to hold the recital as proved.[8]

The discretion for raising the presumption must be exercised in a judicial manner basing on the particular circumstances of each case.[9]

11. PRESUMPTION IS REBUTTABLE

A presumption drawn by the court under Section 90 it is rebuttable.[10]

12. OBJECTION TO THE ADMISSIBILITY WHEN TO BE TAKEN

The absence of any objection at the time of the admission of the document will not preclude the opposite party from urging that there are special circumstances which prevent the presumption under Section 90 from being drawn.[11]

13. POWER OF THE APPELLATE COURTS

Once the discretion is exercised by the Court below, the High Court ought not to interfere without any compelling reason.[12] The appellate court will not interfere unless the discretion has been exercised by the trial court arbitrarily, capriciously or perversely or without due consideration of relevant facts and circumstances of the case.[13]

It is the trial court that should be asked to presume a document to be genuine under Section 90. One can not ask the High Court for the first time to draw the presumption under section. 90.[14] The appellate court should always be slow to interfere with the discretion of the trial court as to the raising or refusing to draw the presumption.[15]

Distinguishing the above decision, it was held that when the document purporting to be more than 30 years is a registered one and it is produced from proper custody, the presumption can be drawn by the court.[16]

Where the appellate court intends to take a different view from the trial courts discretion, an opportunity to adduce further evidence in support of the presumption ought to be given to the party producing the document.[17]

14. UTTAR PRADESH AMENDMENT

By the Uttar Pradesh Civil Laws (Reforms and Amendment) Act 34 of 1954, Section 90 was amended. According to that the main section was renumbered as 90(1) with a slight amendment substituting the words of "20 years", for the words "30 years". A new sub-sec. (2) was added which is as follows: "Where any such document as is referred to in sub-Section 1 was registered in accordance with the law relating to registration of documents and a duly certified copy thereof is produced, the court may presume that the signature and every other part of such document which purports to be in the handwriting of any particular person, is in that person's handwriting, and in the case of a document executed or attested, that it was duly executed and attested by the person by whom it purports to have been executed or attested.

Then another section with two clauses were added which are as follows:—

"90A(1). Where any registered document or a duly certified copy thereof or any certified copy of any document which is part of the record of a court of justice, is produced from any custody which the court in the particular case considers proper, the court may presume that the original was executed by the person by whom it purports to have been executed.

(2) This presumption shall not be made in respect of any document which is the basis of a suit or of a defence or is relied upon in the plaint or written statement. The explanation to sub-sec. (1) of Section 90 will also apply to this section".

It was held that the presumption under Section 90-A may be made only if the original shows on the face of it the name of the person by whom it purports to have been executed; the mere fact that it is 20 or

30 years old does not make it admissible without proof; the presumption under Section 90-A is with regard to the execution of a document; and it that respect Section 90-A is narrower in scope than Section 90 of the act under which a presumption may be made that a document is in the handwriting of a person by whom it purports to have been written; it is not without reason that the Legislature while amending Section 90 confined the scope of Section 90-A to raising the presumption regarding the execution, as, it has within its view not only a registered document but also certified copies of the document forming part of the record of a court of justice.[18]

The Sub-Registrar is not a court of justice within the meaning of Section 90-A; a certified copy of an application made to him cannot, therefore, be relied upon to draw a presumption that the original was executed by the person by whom it purports to have been executed.[19]

The effect of the presumption under Section 90 of the UP Amendment is that a formal proof of such document is dispensed with and the document is admissible in evidence.[20]

In Ram Jas v. Surendra Nath[21] overruling[22] was held that Section 90-A (2) does not override and nullify Section 90, even if the document is more than 20 years old is the basis of the suit or the defence or is relied upon in the plaint or written statement; Section 90-A is independent of Section 90; the presumption though not available under one section can still be drawn under another section.

It was held dealing with the UP Amendment Act of 1954 that:

(1) so far as the registered documents are cocerned all are not governed by Section 90-A including Section 90-A cl. (2); otherwise Section 90 would be redundant and superfluous; the presumption under Section 90 so far as it relates to registered documents applies to the documents which are more than 20 years old and this presumption is not subject to a condition similar to the one contained in Section 90-A (2); on the other hand the presumption available under Section 90-A (1) applies to registered documents or copies thereof which are not more than 20 years old and that is subject to the condition laid down in Section 90-A (2).

(2) It was further held that if the document is not the basis of the suit but simply relied on as a piece of evidence its genuineness can be presumed under Section 90, if it is more than 20 years old, and under Section 90-A (1), if it is a registered document or a duly certified copy thereof and is less than 20 years old.

A lady asserted herself to B the Bhumidar in consolidation proceedings. In proof of her claim she relied on a sale deed transferring ownership of certain plot, when she prefered a claim for that plot as the objector in the consolidation proceedings, it was held by the Allahabad High court that the sale deed cannot be said to be the basis of her suit claiming the plot, but only a piece of evidence in support of the claim.[23]

It was held that the presumption of due execution and attestation cannot be drawn in respect of a document less than 20 years old and not forming part of court records and which is the basis of claim of title of one of the parties.[24]

It was held that Section 90(2) was not controlled by 90-A(2). Thus a certified copy of a document is one in regard to which a presumption can be raised under Section 90-(1) as in the case of the original, provided the original document is more than 20 years old.[25]

The presumption under Section 90 is not subject to the exception given in Section 90-A(2), the correct interpretation of Section 90 as amended, and Section 90-A read together will be that in cases where a registered document or certified copy thereof is more than 20 yeras old, the same may be presumed without formal proof of execution and attestation, even though the said document or the certified copy is the basis of the suit or of defence. Whereas, under Section 90-A if the document is not more than 20 years old but is a registered document or a duly certified copy thereof a presumption about its due execution can also be made provided the document does not form the basis of the suit or defence.[26]

It was held in another case that the presumption which was by virtue of Section 90(1) available in respect of the original documents has now been by virtue of Section 90(2) extended even to certified copies of registered documents. There arises no occasion to raise a presumption under Section 90 till a case for reception of secondary evidence has been made out. After the amendment the presumption under Section 90 is to be made in respect of 20 years old document and the same may be extended to copies.[27]

Where a copy of the document from the record of a Court was produced only as a piece of evidence in support of certain factual allegation made in the plaint, it was held that the court could validly raise the presumption as it was executed by the parties by whom it purported to be executed and that sub-sec. (2) does not apply to such a document.[28]

Presumption as to electronic records five years old.

[29][S. 90-A. Where any electronic record, purporting or proved to be five years old, is produced from any custody which the Court in the particular case considers proper, the Court may presume that the digital signature which purports to be the digital signature of any particular person was so affixed by him or any person authorised by him in this behalf.

Explanation.*—Electronic records are said to be in proper custody if they are in the place in which, and under the care of the person with whom, they naturally be; but no custody is improper if it is proved to have had a legitimate origin, or the circumstances of the particular case are such as to render such an origin probable.

STATE AMENDMENTS

Uttar Pradesh.—After Section 90, add the following as a new Section 90-A:

'90-A. (1) Where any registered document or a duly certified copy thereof or any certified copy of a document which is part of the record of a court of justice, is produced from any custody which the court in the particular case considers proper, the court may presume that the original was executed by the person by whom it purports to have been executed.

(2) This presumption shall not be made in respect of any document which is the basis of a suit or of a defence or is relied upon in the plaint or written statement.

The explanation to sub-section (1) of Section 90 will also apply to the section'.—Vide U.P. Act XXIV of 1954.

COMMENTS

1. THE INFORMATION TECHNOLOGY ACT, 2000 PRESUMPTION AS TO ELECTRONIC RECORD FIVE YEARS OLD

The new Section 90A says that where an electronic record, purporting to be or proved to be five years old, is produced from the custody which the Court considers proper in a particular case, it may presume that the digital signature which purports to be the digital signature of any person was so affixed by him or by any person authorised by him in that behalf.

The explanation defines "proper custody" saying that the electronic records are said to be in proper custody if they are in the place in which and under the care of the person with whom they would

CHAPTER VI

OF THE EXCLUSION OF ORAL BY DOCUMENTARY EVIDENCE

Evidence of terms of contracts, grants and other dispositions of property reduced to form of document

S. 91. When the terms of a contract, or of a grant, or of any other disposition of property, have been reduced to the form of a document, and in all cases in which any matter is required by law to be reduced to the form of a document, no evidence shall be given in proof of the terms of such contract, grant or other disposition of property, or of such matter, except the document itself, or secondary evidence of its contents in cases in which secondary evidence is admissible under the provisions hereinbefore contained.

Exception 1.*—When a public officer is required by law to be appointed in writing, and when it is shown that any particular person has acted as such officer, the writing by which he is appointed need not be proved.

Exception 2.*—Wills admitted to probate in India may be proved by the probate.

Explanation 1.*—This section applies equally to cases in which the contracts, grants or dispositions of property referred to are contained in one document, and to cases in which they are contained in more documents than one.

Explanation 2.*—Where there are more originals than one, one original only need be proved.

Explanation 3.*—The statement, in any document whatever, of a fact other than the facts referred to in this section, shall not preclude the admission of oral evidence as to the same fact.

ILLUSTRATIONS

(a) If a contract is contained in several letters, all the letters in which it is contained must be proved.

(b) If a contract is contained in a bill of exchange, the bill of exchange must be proved.

(c) If a bill of exchange is drawn in a set of three, one only need be proved.

(d) A contracts, in writing, with B, for the delivery of indigo upon certain terms. The contract mentions the fact that B had paid A the price of other indigo contracted for verbally on another occasion.

Oral evidence is offered that no payment was made for the other indigo. The evidence is admissible.

(e) A give B a receipt for money paid by B.

Oral evidence is offered of the payment.

The evidence is admissible.

COMMENTS

1. PRINCIPLE AND SCOPE

When a transaction has been reduced to writing either by agreement of the parties or by requirement of law, the writing becomes the exclusive memorial thereof, and no evidence shall be given to prove the transaction, except the document itself or secondary evidence of its contents where such evidence is admissible. This rule is based on the principle that the best evidence, of which the case in its nature is susceptible, should always be presented....This rule does not demand the greatest amount of evidence which can possibly be given of any fact, but its design is to prevent the introduction of any which, from the nature of the case, supposes that better evidence is in the possession of the party. It is adopted for the prevention of fraud, for, when better evidence is withheld, it is only fair to presume that the party has some sinister motive for not producing it, and that, if offered, his design would be frustrated. The rule thus becomes essential to the pure administration of justice.[1] The best evidence about the contents of a document is the document itself and it is the production of the document that is required by this section in proof of its contents.[2]

Under this section (1) when the terms of (a) a contract, (b) a grant, or (c) any disposition of property have been reduced to the form of a document; or (2) when any matter is required by law to be reduced to the form of a document. Then (a) the document itself, or (b) secondary evidence of its contents, must be put in evidence.

The first part refers to transactions voluntarily reduced to writing. The second refers to those cases in which any matter is required by law to be reduced to the form of a document, e.g., sale of immovable property of the value of one hundred rupees and upwards, mortgage for an amount of one hundred rupees or more, a lease of immovable property for any term exceeding one year, a trust of immovable property, a gift of immovable property etc.[3]

These are two exceptions to these provisions:

(1) When a public officer is required by law to be appointed in writing, and any officer has acted as such, the writing need not be proved;

(2) Wills admitted to probate in India may be proved by the probate.

The general rule laid down in this section is also subject to the exceptions laid down in the following Ss. 95 to 99. The section has no application when the writing is not evidence of the matter reduced to writing.

This section and S. 92 define the cases in which documents are exclusive evidence of transactions which they embody. They only apply when the document evidencing a contract appears to contain all the terms thereof. The inference that a writing was intended to contain the whole agreement may be drawn from the document itself as well as from extrinsic evidence.[4] Sections 93-100 provide for the interpretation of documents by oral evidence.

Illustration (b) refers to the first part of the section.

This section deals with exclusiveness of documentary evidence, whereas, Section 92 deals with conclusiveness of documentary evidence, though SIR. JAMES STEPHEN in his digest[5] deals with both the sections under one head "the parol evidence".

In Bai Hira Devi v. Official Assignee of Bombay[6] the Supreme Court pointed out the principle underlying Section 91 and the difference between Section 91 and 92. It was observed: "Section 91 is based on what is sometimes described as the "best evidence rule". The best evidence about the contents of a document is the document itself and it is the production of the document that is required by Section 91 in proof of its contents. It is after the document has been produced to prove its terms under Section 91 that the provisions of Section 92 come into operation for the purpose of excluding evidence of any oral agreement or statement, for the purpose of contradicting, varying, adding to or subtracting from its terms. Sections 91 and 92 in effect supplement each other. Section 91 would be frustrated without the aid of Section 92 and Section 92 would be inoperative without the aid of Section 91. The two sections, however, differ in some material particulars. Section 91 applies to all documents, whether they purport to dispose of rights or not, whereas Section 92 applies to documents which dispose of property. Section 91 applies to documents which are both bilateral and unilateral, unlike Section 92 the application of which is confined only to bilateral documents. Section 91 lays down the rule of universal application and is not confined to the executant or executants of the documents. Section 92 on the other hand, applies only between the parties to the instrument or their representatives in interest".

It is a cardinal rule in the Law of Evidence that the best available evidence should be brought before the court. Sections 60, 64 and 91 are based on this rule.[7]

PHIPSON states: "When a transaction has been reduced to, or recorded in, writing either by requirement of law, or agreement of the parties, the writing becomes, in general, the exclusive record thereof, and no evidence may be given to prove the terms of the transaction, except the document itself or secondary evidence of its contents". (PHIPSON on Evidence, 15th Edn. (2000), para 42.01, page 1157).[8]

In Meer Mohammed Kajen Jowhurry v. Khetoo Debee[9] it was observed, "the rule with regard to writings is that oral proof cannot be substituted for the written evidence of any contract which the parties have put into writing. And the reason is that the writing is tacitly considered by the parties themselves as the only repository and the appropriate evidence of their agreement.[10]

Where the terms of the contract are reduced to writing, Section 91 comes into play. The primary evidence from which the intention of the parties is to be gathered, is the document itself and surrounding circumstances. Subsequent conduct cannot be proved to show that the intention of the parties was different.[11] Where the original sanad which is an ancient grant was produced and when there is no ambiguity, it was held that the conduct of the parties cannot be looked into in interpreting the sanad by adducing evidence.[12]

The Supreme Court in Fort Gloster Industries v. Sethia Mercantile Pvt. Ltd[13] held that the Court could not refer to any evidence other than the documents relating to arbitration agreement for determining the question whether arbitration could be invoked for settlement of the dispute; that the terms of the arbitration contract required to be in writing (Section 33 of Arbitration Act 1940 and Section 10 of the Contract Act) cannot be proved otherwise than by offering the document itself in evidence.

An arbitration agreement to refer a dispute to an arbitrator is a contract within the meaning of Section 91.[14] A contract to refer disputes to arbitration is different from the proceedings of the arbitrators in respect of the disputes. The Evidence Act is not applicable to the arbitration proceedings but will apply to the arbitration agreement.[15]

In a case where there was an agreement for sale of two ancestral houses jointly held by two brothers (defendant's 1&3) for a consideration of Rs. 2,250 out of which Rs. 200 was paid as earnest money and when a separate oral agreement was pleaded, it was held that neither Section 91 nor provisos 2, 3 Illus. (g) to proviso 6 of Section 22 would enable the plaintiff to lead evidence to spell out two different agreements in respect of the two houses by showing that the brothers were separated and houses were separately owned by them on the date of agreement.[16]

In a case of joint purchasers of property, it was held no amount of evidence could be led or considered for giving a finding of exclusive ownership of plaintiff over a passage.[17]

2. DOCUMENT MUST CONTAIN ALL THE TERMS

The Privy Council in Mohammad Akbar Khan v. Attar Singh[18] observed: "Before evidence is excluded under Section 91 and 92 Evidence Act, it must be proved that the document in question records or purports to record all the terms of the contract between the parties". It follows that when all the terms have not been reduced to writing oral evidence is not excluded.

In that case there was nothing in the document which explained how the money came to be received; and there was nothing to prevent the parties from showing that it was paid by way of loan, deposit, or on account of some joint venture. The use of the money might have been limited in various ways. The only terms which the document did express were as to the date of repayment of the money expressed to be received and as to the rate of interest. These terms the defendants did not seek to contradict, vary add to or subtract from. The Board therefore held that it could proceed to examine the evidence untrammelled by the restriction imposed upon themselves of having to disregard the receipt or evidence as to the actual transaction.

If the parties intended only to reduce to writing a portion of the terms of the contract, then they are entitled to give parol evidence of the terms which they did not intend to reduce to writing[19] Where parties to a contract agree to substitute a written instrument for an oral contract the ultimate contract is deemed to be contained in the instrument alone and no oral evidence of its terms can be given thereafter[20]

3. COMPROMISE—DOCUMENT

Where there was a written compromise between the parties and when it was sought to be enforced as a contract the introduction of a new term by way of oral evidence is not permissible in view of Section 91 and the proof of terms can be only by filing the compromise deed and not by oral evidence.[21]

A wakf can be created orally under Muhammadan Law, but when the terms of dedication are reduced to the form of a writing, no evidence can be given to prove the terms except the document itself or secondary evidence thereof.[22]

4. TERMS

The expression "terms" in this section and S. 92 relates to statements, assertions or representations contained in a written contract which relate to the subject-matter of the contract and to something to be done or not to be done under the contract, and has no application to a provision in the nature of a condition precedent to the very existence or formation of a contract.[23]

Where a sale deed contained a term for the reconveyance of the property under certain conditions it was held that such stipulation can not be proved by oral evidence in view of the bar of Section 91.[24]

Where the tenant constructed a kitchen without the landlord's permission, it was held that in the absence of the proof of usage, a condition that the tenant shall not construct any other structures to the building is implied in the tenancy agreement, and that the tenant constructing the kitchen amounts to breach of a condition of the tenancy. Hence Section 91 is not attracted and the plaintiff can prove the breach of the condition.[25] In a contract of sale of property, it was held that the manner and time of payment of consideration can be proved by oral evidence.[26] In regard to a recital in a gift deed that there was no consideration, the Bombay High Court held that it is always open to the parties to prove that a certain recital which is a statement of fact is not correct and it can be shown that there was consideration and the document was a sale.[27]

Section 91 and 92 are a bar for any party to set up a case that consideration for sale is more than what was mentioned in the document and when it was not the case that the consideration was not paid or there was failure of consideration or the consideration agreed between the parties was of a different kind than what was mentioned in the document.[28] The price agreed upon is a term of the contract when such agreement is reduced to writing. Any oral agreement pleaded for paying a higher price cannot be admitted.[29]

Where the contract of sale of which specific performance is sought, is uncertain no oral evidence can be allowed to add to its terms.[30]

When a sale deed had been executed and registered, in a suit for possession by the vendee, it is not open to the vendor to let in oral evidence to show that the terms of the contract between the parties were different or were at variance with the terms contained in the document.[31]

The expression "terms" of a contract in Section 91 and the corresponding expression in Section 92 has no application to a statement contained in writing which is in the nature of a condition precedent to the very formation of that contract.[32]

The Privy Council in Tyagaraja Mudaliyar and others v. Vedathanni[33] observed: "Section 92, only excludes oral evidence to vary the terms of the written contract and has no reference to the question whether the parties had agreed to contract on the terms set-forth in the document. The objection must therefore, be based on Section 91 which only excludes oral evidence as to the terms of a written contract. Clearly under that section, a defendant suing as in the present case, upon a written contract purporting to be signed by him, could not be precluded in disproof of such agreement from giving oral evidence that his signature was a forgery". Thus the difference can be seen between an attempt to show that the terms of a contract were different from those recorded in the document and an attempt to show that the contract as mentioned in the document was not the real contract between the parties, but something else.[34]

In the case of mortgagors also, it was held that one mortgagor can show that he was only a surety for the other mortgagors and they are liable to pay the amount which he was compelled to pay under the mortgage deed.[35]

Neither Section 91 nor Section 92 has application unless in the first instance there is a contract or a grant or any other disposition of property; evidence intended to show that there was no grant, contract or disposition of property does not offend the provisions of either section; notwithstanding the recital of payment of consideration in a document, evidence can be given to show that the consideration was not actually paid.[36] Where the deed of Nikahnama mentioned certain amount as prompt dower, it was held that Section 91 only excludes oral evidence as to the terms of the contract, but oral evidence is admissible to show that a document executed by a person was never intended to operate as an agreement and was brought into existence for the purpose of creating evidence about some other matter; Sections 91 and 92 will not debar a party, to show that there was no agreement between the parties.[37] In[38] the Privy Council held that where a document is signed only by one of the parties, it does not amount to a written agreement and hence oral evidence to prove that the real intention of the parties was different from that exposed by the terms of the document is admissible. The section does not preclude a party from proving that the real contract is different from what was found in the deed.[39] Where a partner's signature was not on the deed of partnership, it was held that evidence was not excluded by Section 91 to prove the fact of partnership.[40]

5. CONDUCT OF PARTIES

The Supreme Court held in Bhaskar Waman Joshi v. Shri Narayan Rambilas Agarwal,[41] that the form in which the deed is clothed is not decisive. In a sale coupled with an agreement to reconvey, there is no relation of debtor and creditor; nor is the price charged upon the property conveyed, but the sale is subject to an obligation to retransfer the property within the period specified. The definition of a 'mortgage' by conditional sale itself contemplates an ostensible sale of the property. The question in each case is one of determination of the real character of the transaction to be ascertained from the provisions of the deed viewed in the light of surrounding circumstances. If the language employed is ambiguous, the intention may be ascertained from the contents of the deed with such extrinsic evidence as may by law, be permitted to be adduced to show in what manner the language of the deed was related to the existing facts. Oral evidence of intention is not admissible in interpreting the covenants of the deed, but, evidence to explain or even to contradict the recitals as distinguished from the terms of the document may of course be given. Evidence of contemporaneous conduct is always admissible as surrounding circumstances, but evidence as to subsequent conduct of the parties is inadmissible.[42]

Where the terms of the document are unambiguous and envisage an out and out sale it was held that no oral evidence of the conduct of the parties or the surrounding circumstances could be admitted in evidence to vary or contradict its terms by indicating that the said document was not a sale, but a "Viswas Bai" which means a sale as a result of good feeling amongst the parties or because of the confidence that one reposes in the other.[43]

Where a document showed no sharing of profits but one person was required to pay a fixed sum periodically to the other and carry on business in his own name on the property of the other, the question was whether it was a partnership or lease. In deciding the question whether the transaction was a lease or a partnership, it was held oral evidence showing the transaction to be a lease could not be rejected and Section 91 was no bar.[44]

Section 159 of the Evidence Act states that a witness may during the examination in court refresh his memory by referring to any writing made by himself at the time of the transaction concerning which he is questioned. He may also refer to any such writing made by any other person. Section 160 states that a witness may also testify to the facts mentioned in any document as is mentioned in Section 159, although he has no specific recollection of the facts themselves, if he is sure that the facts were correctly recorded in the document. But before referring to those documents, it must be produced and shown to the adverse party if he so requires, or if the adverse party wants to cross-examine the witness on that document.

Where a contract was signed by the defendant personally and he attempted to lead oral evidence to show that he was contracting as an agent and that the name of his principal was disclosed at the time of the contract, it was held that such evidence was not admissible for the purpose of exonerating a contracting party from liability, for that would be substituting different agreement from that evidenced by the writing.[45]

Evidence is admissible to show whether a party contracted as an agent or in the capacity of a seller or buyer.[46] The Supreme Court while dealing with a rent note held that, by reading Section 91 with Section 92 proviso 4, of the Act, oral evidence is admissible to prove that the real tenant was other than the ostensible tenant appearing on the note.[47]

Relying on Thyagaraja Mudaliyar v. Vedathanni,[48] a division bench of the Allahabad Court held that Sections 91 and 92 do not preclude a party from giving evidence to show that the written agreement executed was never intended to operate as an agreement, but was brought into existence solely for creating evidence about some other matter.[49] In a suit for possession of a house on the strength of a sale deed the defendant sought to prove that the sale deed had not been executed, so as to operate as a sale deed, but was executed as a sequel to another transaction of agreement to sell which the defendant had entered into with the plaintiff regarding the sale of his land. It was held that such defence did not run counter either to Section 91 or Section 92.[50] Sections 91 and 92 do not preclude the defendants from showing by evidence that though the document was executed in the form of an agreement for sale of land, the real nature of the transaction was a loan for which the document was a security.[51]

Where the parties agree that a negotiable instrument shall be taken as conditional payment only and not as accord and satisfaction of the original debt, that term of the agreement will not be generally embodied in the negotiable instrument and in such cases Section 91 has no application.[52]

A collateral agreement between the parties that the sale deed between them is nominal and will not be acted upon, is not hit by Sections 91 and 92 and can be proved by direct and circumstantial evidence.[53] Oral evidence is admissible to determine the questions whether a gift deed was acted upon or not.[54]

Section 91 only excludes oral evidence of the terms of a document but not of existence of the contract or the relationship of landlord and tenant brought about by possession and payment of rent.[55]

When one of the brothers executed a pronote for a business which was carried on jointly with his brothers in partnership oral evidence was admitted to prove an assurance that the amount was taken for the joint business.[56]

The Supreme Court in Mahindra and Mahindra v. Union of India[57] held "It is true that a clause in an agreement may embody a trade practice and such a trade practice may have the actual or probable effect of restricting or destroying competition and hence they constitute a restrictive trade practice. To know the effect of such clause oral evidence can be adduced "to determine whether a particular trade practice set out in the agreement has or may have the effect of preventing, distorting or restricting competitions so as to constitute "a restrictive trade practice" under the Monopolies and Restrictive Trade Practice Act 1969 and that Sections 91 and 92 are no bar as it would not amount to contradicting varying, adding to, or subtracting from the terms of the document". The Supreme Court held that the decision in Hindustan Liver Ltd., Bombay v. Monopolies and Restrictive Trade Practices Commission[58] is not good law. In Hindustan Lever case[59] it was held that where the *clause*s of the agreement were clear and the meaning decisive, no oral evidence could be led to deduce their meaning or to vary it in view of Sections 91 and 92.

6. CONTRACTS

Where the endorsements by the next reversioners on the deed of alienation by the Hindu widow merely recite the fact that they knew the contents of the deed, the endorsements cannot be said to be the records of contracts entered into by the alienee with the reversioners for obtaining their consent to the transaction and hence oral evidence of the alienee regarding the consent of the reversioners is not rendered inadmissible under Section 91.[60]

In Deepchandra v. Md. Sajjad Ali Khan, a receipt showed that some amount of earnest money out of the sale consideration was received from the vendee through another person and that the sale deed would be executed within three months and in default the contract would be deemed cancelled and it bore the signature of the vendor. The contention of the plaintiff that the receipt in that case was concluded contract and that no oral evidence can be adduced by the defendant to show that because a clause regarding inflation was not incorporated it was not a concluded contract was negatived. AGARWALA J for himself and WANCHOO J observed at p. 105 "In order that Sections 91 and 92 should operate it must be proved (1) that there was a contract or a grant or other disposition of property and (2) that the terms of such contract, grant or other disposition of property were reduced to the form of a document. If either of these conditions is not fulfilled, the application of these sections is not attracted. The defence plea being that there is no concluded contract, neither of these sections can be said to bar the defence from proving their plea by oral evidence".[61]

Further it was observed "Plea of the Vendor (defendant) might either fall under Proviso 3 to Section 92 or it might be taken as a plea not converted by Section 92 at all. In both cases oral evidence is admissible in support of the plea. Thus the document did not preclude the Vendor from showing that the parties did not agree as to one of the terms in the sale deed and that there was no completed contract".

It was held that the liability of the insurer was to be ascertained from the express terms of the agreement if it a written agreement and no other evidence de hors terms of the agreement would be admitted.[62] Where a written settlement of the industrial dispute was arrived at between the parties, it was held that the same could not be varied or modified by an oral agreement.[63] Where a party as part of a compromise filed a letter in Rent Control Proceedings agreeing to spend certain sums of money on the property of another and subsequently a registered document of lease came into existence in respect of such property and in the suit for damages relying on the earlier letter filed as a part of compromise it was held that such a letter was admissible to prove the damages and Section 91 is no bar.[64]

7. 'ANY MATTER IS REQUIRED BY LAW TO BE REDUCED TO THE FORM OF A DOCUMENT'

Where any matter is required by law to be reduced to the form of a document, then the document itself must be put in evidence, e.g., deeds, conveyances of land, mortgages, wills, etc. No other evidence can be substituted so long as the writing exists. But where the matter is not required by law to be reduced to the form of a document, this section does not apply, e.g., in 1866 an oral agreement with transfer of possession sufficed to create a mortgage and therefore a mortgage could be proved aliunde even if there was no registered document[65], but an unregistered memorandum of partition between the members of a joint family is inadmissible in evidence. However, it can be used for collateral purpose of proving the intention of the coparceners and oral evidence to prove partition can also be let in but[66] no oral evidence is admissible to prove the rent payable under a lease reduced to writing.[67]

A judgment of conviction has to be in writing. This is therefore a matter required by law to be reduced to the form of a document. Such matter can be proved either by the document itself or by secondary evidence when it is admissible. When there was no suggestion that the original judgment of previous conviction was lost, oral evidence cannot be led to prove the previous conviction.[68]

8. CONFESSION

A confession of an accused person made to a Magistrate holding an inquiry is a matter required by law to be reduced to the form of a document within the meaning of this section, and no evidence can be given of the terms of such a confession except the record, if any, made under S. 164 of the Code of Criminal Procedure.[69]

9. DEPOSITION

In a prosecution for perjury, the deposition is to be produced in evidence against the accused during his trial not for the purpose of proving its truth but for the purpose of proving that he made it. Section 91, Evidence Act deals with the production of a document to prove the truth of its contents and not to prove its existence. If the prosecution had to prove that the deposition made by the witness is correct, it would have to produce the deposition and Section 91 would bar any other evidence. But when the prosecution has simply to prove that the witness made the deposition, there is nothing in Section 91 to prevent this fact being proved without producing the deposition itself.[70]

The omission to read over his deposition to the witness, in accordance with Order XVIII, Rule 5, of the Civil Procedure Code, renders the same inadmissible in evidence against him at his subsequent trial for forgery and oral evidence of its contents is excluded by this section.[71]

The Madras High Court held that seeing or hearing an act of deposing is a physical act which can be proved by any one who heard or saw the person giving the deposition.[72]

In PHIPSON ON EVIDENCE, 15th Edn. (2000), Page: 1169, para 42-17, it is stated: "The same rule applies to the statutory deposition of a witness in a civil or criminal proceeding which cannot be contradicted, or varied by extrinsic evidence. As to additions to the depositions, since the depositions do not necessarily give the whole statement of the witness or even necessarily his own words, there seems no valid reason why parol additions should not now, as formerly, be admitted, when the deposition is used to contradict the witness (although it would not be possible to give extrinsic evidence by way of addition or contradiction when the deposition is used in the absence of the witness, since the statutory conditions as to admissibility are not fulfilled)."

Section 91 does not refer to depositions recorded by the court during the course of judicial proceedings, it only refers to the terms of a document such as, contract, grant, or any other disposition of property reduced to writing.[73]

Contents of the confessional statements recorded by a Magistrate can not be proved except by producing the record of confession.

10. DOCUMENT

Section 91 at several places uses the word "document" by which, it must be taken, the legislature meant something purporting to have been executed by a party and signed by him in token of execution.[74]

Under Section 153-C (3) of the Companies Act of 1913 (as amended by Act 52 of 1951), a "consent in writing" is a condition precedent; the document itself should prove that consent has been given; no evidence either by way of affidavit or of oral sworn statement in court can be given under Section 91 to prove that such consent was given.[75]

Where the terms of a contract or disposition of property which were under an oral agreement previously, are reduced to the form of a document, it would take the place of the previous oral agreement or contract between the parties. No oral evidence can be adduced under Section 91 to prove the original terms except by producing the document.[76]

11. PROMISSORY NOTES—UNSTAMPED OR INSUFFICIENTLY STAMPED DOCUMENTS

Under Section 35 of the Indian Stamp Act no instrument chargeable with the duty shall be admitted in evidence for any purpose by any person unless such instrument is duly stamped. The Privy Council in Ram Rattan v. Parama Nand[77] held that the words "for any purpose" in Section 35 should be given their natural meaning and effect and would include a collateral purpose.

In the case of a negotiable instrument there is an unconditional undertaking by the maker to pay a certain sum of money. According to the definition in Section 4 of the Negotiable Instruments Act and the illustrations (a) & (b) thereunder the consideration mentioned in the promissory note may be a complete discharge or satisfaction of a loan. Illustration (b), to Section 91 of the Evidence Act says that if a contract is contained in a bill of exchange, the bill of exchange must be proved. Thus it covers only the case of complete discharge or satisfaction of the loan. A promissory note may come into existence for a pre-existing debt or a past liability, in which case the document would be only as a conditional discharge or payment of the loan, or a collateral security. But if the agreement between the parties is for a contemporaneous loan and it is reduced to writing and if the document (pronote) becomes inadmissible, no suit would lie on the original cause of action for the loan.

12. SUIT ON PROMISSORY NOTE INADMISSIBLE IN EVIDENCE

The rulings of the Indian High Courts on the question where money is lent to a person who executes a promissory note, but the note is inadmissible in evidence for want of sufficient stamp or for any other reason, may be classified into two classes lucidly enunciated by GARTH, C.J. in[78] where the question was whether a copy of a lost promissory note, which was itself inadmissible as being insufficiently stamped, could be received in evidence. The court held that it could not be received in evidence, GARTH, C.J., said: "When a cause of action for money is once complete in itself, whether for goods sold, or for money lent, or for any other claim, and the debtor then gives a bill or note to the creditor for payment of the money at a future time, the creditor, if the bill or note is not paid at maturity, may always, as a rule, sue for the original consideration, provided that he has not endorsed or lost or parted with the bill or note, under such circumstances as to make the debtor liable upon it to some third person. In such cases the bill or note is said to be taken by the creditor on account of the debt, and if it is not paid at maturity, the creditor may disregard the bill or note and sue for the original consideration. But when the original cause of action is the bill or note itself, and does not exist independently of it, as for instance, when, in consideration of A depositing money with B, B contracts by a promissory note to repay it with interest at six months' date, here there is no cause of action for money lent, or otherwise than upon the note itself, because the deposit is made upon the terms contained in the note and no other. In such a case the note is the only contract between the parties, and if for want of proper stamp or some other reason the note is not admissible in evidence, the creditor must lose his money". In a later case, however, the same High Court tried to explain away the above case and held in a suit brought on a hatchitta (promissory note) bearing an insufficient stamp and in which the defendant admitted the loan but pleaded payment, that the promissory note was not admissible in evidence but the plaintiff had a cause of action independently of it.[79]

Subsequently, in another case it laid down that the question, whether, when a bill or note is found to be inadmissible in evidence, the payee can sue on the original consideration, depends upon whether the cause of action with regard to the original consideration is one, which is complete in itself, and the debtor then gives a bill or note to the creditor for payment of the money at a future time. If this be so, then the plaintiff may disregard the promissory note, if he chooses, and sue upon the original debt. Where, however, the original cause of action is a bill or note itself and does not exist independently of it, then the plaintiff cannot disregard the note and sue for the original consideration.[80]

The Bombay High Court approved of the principle stated in Sheikh Akbar v. Sheikh Khan[81] in a case in which the plaintiff sued to recover from the defendant the balance of a debt due on an unstamped note passed to him by the defendant for a consideration of Rs. 38. The note recited that the defendant had received the amount, and would repay it after three months from the date of its execution. The defendant admitted, by his written statement, execution of the note and the receipt of Rs. 37 in the shape of paddy, but alleged that he had paid off the debt. He also contended that the note being unstamped could not be admitted in evidence. It was held that the document sued on was promissory note, and that the suit being brought on it as the original cause of action, the admission of its contents by the defendant did not avail the plaintiff, the document itself being inadmissible for want of a stamp and that the plaintiff could not recover irrespective of the promissory note, as he did not seek to prove the consideration otherwise than by the note, which was inadmissible in evidence and the admission contained in the defendant's written statement did not amount to an admission of the claim as for money lent.[82]

The distinction between cases in which a suit is brought solely on a promissory note or hundi, and cases in which there is and can be a claim to recover the original loan, has been acknowledged[83]. Where there is an independent admission of a loan by the holder of a hundi, bill or note, which is defective, and inadmissible in evidence for want of a stamp, may still sue on the consideration the person to whom he gave it, though he cannot use the bill in support of his suit.[84]

It was observed in Jacob & Co. v. Viaimsey,[85] that the transaction under a pronote may be of three kinds:—(1) Pronote containing all facts relating to it as shown in illu. (b) to Section 91 in which case if it is insufficiently stamped no suit would lie.

(2) The pronote may be regarded as a conditional payment of the loan amount in which case suit can be filed on the original contract for the loan.

(3) A pronote may be given as a security for the loan in which case the plaintiff need not sue on the pronote whether it is properly stamped or not, as he can bring a suit on the loan itself.

The Madras High Court has in a Full Bench case held that whether a suit lies on the debt apart from the instrument depends on the circumstances under which the instrument is executed. If the promissory note embodies all the terms of the contract and the instrument is improperly stamped no suit on the debt will lie. This section and S. 35 of the Indian Stamp Act bar the way. But if it does not embody all the terms of the contract, the true nature of the transaction can be proved and, where an instrument has been given as a collateral security or by way of conditional payment, a suit on the debt will lie. The fact that the execution of the promissory note is contemporaneous with the borrowing, cannot exclude the possibility of the instrument having been given as collateral security or by way of conditional payment. There is no presumption that the giving of a promissory note by a debtor to his creditor operates as a conditional payment only. A lender suing on the original consideration on the ground that the instrument was given by way of conditional payment must prove facts which warrant that inference.[86]

The promise to repay the amount of loan is certainly a term of the contract, and if there was a completed contract which existed upon the execution of the pronote, an action would lie on such contract even though the promissory note executed subsequently cannot be admitted in evidence for any reason.[87]

Where the opposite party admitted the fact of execution of the document, it was held that the document need not be proved even when the document in question is not admissible on account of any provisions of the Stamp Act.[88]

In Lothumasu Sambasiva Rao v. T. Balakotaiah, a full bench of seven judges of the Andhra Pradesh High Court discussed in considerable length the different points of view expressed by almost all the High Courts as also decisions of the Privy Council and the Supreme Court and held that the plaintiff can rely on the original cause of action where the suit promissory note is inadmissible in evidence under Section 35 of the Stamp Act, provided there is an allegation in the plaint and proof that the promissory note did not incorporate all the terms of the contract and that it was executed as a conditional payment or collateral security. JUSTICE ALLADI KUPPUSWAMI, in a separate judgment while agreeing with the first part of the decision observed that the right to fall back on the original consideration is not restricted to a case where the promissory note is executed by way of conditional payment or by way of collateral security.[89]

Where the debt and the pronote were simultaneous and there was neither a contract with the firm nor was it the intention of the parties to treat the promissory note as a part of the debt transaction, it could not be said that the pronote merely evidenced any previous concluded transaction.[90]

In Chuni Lal Manga v. Mangat Rami,[91] the Delhi High Court held that where the execution of a pronote follows the advance of money, but there is infirmity in the document, the plaintiff can rely on the advance of money as the two causes of actions being distinct and separate Section 91 is not a bar to an action on the original cause of action.

The Allahabad High Court has in a Full Bench case laid down that it is not open to a party who has lent money on terms recorded in a promissory note, which turns out to be inadmissible in evidence for want of proper stamp duty, to recover his money by proving orally the terms of the contract, in contravention of the provision of this section.[92] In a later Full Bench case it laid down that the entire terms of the contract were embodied in the promissory note in the above Nazir's case, but where all the substantial terms of the contract have not been embodied in the promissory note and where the promissory note is inadmissible in evidence for defect of proper stamp, it is open to the plaintiff to prove the terms of the contract. It is also pointed out by some of the Judges that the distinction laid down in Nazir's case between cases where the money passed contemporaneously with the execution of the pronote and where it was antecedent in time to the latter is unreal and artificial[93]. Where a loan was already existing, and part of it had been repaid and a promissory note was executed in favour of the creditor for the balance, it was held that the existence of the promissory note did not debar the creditor from resorting to his original consideration or exclude evidence of the oral acknowledgment of the debt.[94]

The Patna High Court has held that where the lending of money and the execution of a promissory note for repayment of it are contemporaneous, the plaintiff in a suit for recovery of the money, is entitled to adduce evidence other than the promissory note itself, in order to prove the loan. Where, therefore, a handnote bore a one-anna stamp instead of a two-anna stamp and was therefore inadmissible in evidence, it was held that the plaintiff was entitled to prove the loan by other evidence[95]. Every loan carries with it a contract to repay and if a handnote, which forms the evidence of the transaction cannot be accepted in evidence for some reason or other, there is nothing in law to prevent the plaintiff from giving other evidence as regards the loan and if he can satisfy the court as regards the truth of his version, he is entitled to a decree[96]. Where there is a partition deed which is inadmisssible in evidence for want of registration it is open to the defendants to prove a previous partition by any other evidence and this section will not operate as a bar to the admissibility of such evidence.[97]

The Lahore High Court has held that where a negotiable instrument taken on account of pre-existing debt is inadmissible in evidence, the creditor may sue for the original consideration, but when the original cause of action is the instrument itself and does not exist independently of it, the plaintiff cannot sue except upon the instrument. Whether there is a cause of action independent of the instrument upon which independent evidence may be given, depends upon the question whether the plaintiff can allege any contract as the basis of his suit which is not the contract reduced to the form of a document. Where the money advanced a short time before the actual execution of a hundi was advanced on the security of the hundi and the agreement between the parties was that the loan should be made in consideration of the hundi, it was held that there was no cause of action independent of the hundi, and as the hundi was inadmissible in evidence on the ground that it was insufficiently stamped, and no secondary evidence could be given under this section, the plaintiff must fail.[98]

The Rangoon High Court has laid down several principles in a Full Bench case. The giving of a negotiable security by a debtor to his creditor operates, prima facie, as a conditional payment only, and not as a satisfaction of the debt, unless the parties agree so to treat it. Such a conditional payment is liable to be defeated on non-payment of the negotiable instrument at maturity. If the negotiable instrument is given by the borrower to the lender and the negotiable instrument is itself the consideration for the loan, or if the instrument is accepted as an accord and satisfaction of the original debt, the lender is restricted to his rights under the negotiable instrument by which he must stand or fall. If it is agreed between the parties that the instrument shall be taken merely as collateral security for the repayment of the loan, the lender is entitled to sue upon the original consideration independently of the security, and without regard to any rights that he may possess under the instrument. If all the terms the agreement under which the loan was made have been embodied in a negotiable instrument or in any other document, no evidence can be adduced in proof of the terms of the contract except the document itself, and if such document is for any reason inadmissible in evidence, the suit must fail. Normally and prima facie a lender is regarded as taking a negotiable instrument only as conditional payment and not in satisfaction of the loan. Where the handing over of the money and of the instrument is simultaneous it does not follow that the instrument is the repository of the terms of the agreement. It is not the time when, but the terms upon which, the loan was made that matters and that is a question of fact to be determined according to the particular circumstances obtaining in each case.[1]

In a Full Bench case, the former Chief Court of Oudh laid down that it was open to the party who had lent money on terms recorded in a promissory note, which turned out to be inadmissible in evidence for want of proper stamp duty, to recover his money by proving orally the advance of the loan although oral evidence to prove the terms of the contract was inadmissible.[2] Where a promissory note is not admissible in evidence being insufficiently stamped, the provision for interest alleged to have been contained in the promissory note cannot be proved and the party lending the money cannot be granted interest as interest, but he is entitled to some compensation for being deprived of his money and the amount of compensation can best be calculated in the same manner as interest is calculated.[3]

The terms contained in the pronote cannot be proved by oral evidence.[4] Where the oral evidence was that the father of the defendant was a worldly-wise man with ability to write the document in his own hand and on the date of payment, he was affected with brain tumour, it was held that variation in his signature in the endorsement on the promote was not inadmissible.[5]

Dealing with Marwar Stamp Act 15 of 1947, it was held that hundis not duly stamped cannot be admitted in evidence and the fact that the duty and the penalty were paid was of no consequence.[6]

In the case of an unstamped document which had been lost or destroyed no secondary evidence could be allowed. The contents of a document which is required to be executed on stamp paper, if not stamped or insufficiently stamped cannot be proved by secondary evidence. That Section 36 of the Stamp Act which provides for payment of stamp or deficit stamp with penalty for purpose of admitting it in evidence has no application to let in secondary evidence where the document itself is not produced.[7]

Where the execution of the pronote and passing of consideration was simultaneous, it was held the plaintiff cannot fall back on original consideration.[8]

Where on the case pleaded it was not possible to hold that a pronote is intended to constitute the contract or that the original contract of loan was merged in or was extinguished by the pronote, it was held that the original contract of loan could be proved apart from the pronote.[9]

There is a difference between inadmissibility of a document for want of proper stamp and the inadmissibility because of non-registration. In the former case if proper stamp and penalty are paid on the document then it can be admitted. In the latter case if it is unregistered, it is not admissible in evidence to prove the contents of it, though it can be used for a collateral purpose.[10]

Where a suit is based on the pronote, it must fail when the pronote is inadmissible in evidence being insufficiently stamped and payment of loan cannot be proved by other evidence.[11]

Where the plaintiff filed a suit not only on the pronote but also on the transaction of the Chit Fund and the plaintiff explained under what circumstances the pronotes were drawn up it was held that though pronotes are inadmissible in evidence, the plaintiff can prove the actual trnasaction and the arrears of the amount of the Chit Fund.[12]

Where a bill of exchange or a pronote is given by a debtor to the creditor in satisfaction of his dues it was held that it is presumed to be a conditional payment and in case the creditor is unable to obtain satisfaction of the pronote he may fall back on the original debt and sue to recover the amount.[13]

The general trend of the decisions of the various high courts subject to a few exceptions may be summed up as follows. When a pronote is not taken in discharge of an oral contract of a loan but is taken only by way of conditional payment or collateral security, it will be presumed to have been so taken unless there is a contract to the contrary. Section 91 has no application to the case and the terms of the original contract of loan can be proved, if the pronote is not admissible in evidence or for any other reason cannot be proved. The fact that the pronote was executed simultaneously with the advance of loan or that the loan was advanced on the basis of the pronote or that the pronote contained all the terms of the contract of loan are all immaterial, provided only that the pronote is not in absolute discharge of the original contract of loan. When the pronote is given by way of conditional security or as collateral security for the loan, the original contract for the loan is provable by evidence and Section 91 is not applicable in such cases.[14]

A certified copy of the original document would not come within the scope of Section 36 of the Stamp Act, because it states that where an instrument has been admitted in evidence, such admission shall not, except as provided in Section 61 be called in question at any stage of the same suit or proceeding on the ground that the instrument had not been duly stamped and the expression "duly stamped" can only arise in regard to an original document and not to its certified copies, which does not require any stamp except some necessary fees for copying the same.[15]

In view of Sections 35 and 36, secondary evidence of the contents of an inadmissible document which is insufficiently stamped, by producing a copy of it is not admissible.[16]

Section 35 only deals with the original instrument. It is not concerned with any copy of an instrument. If Section 35 only deals with original instruments and not copies, Section 36 cannot be so interpreted as to allow secondary evidence of an instrument to have its benefit. In other words Section 35 imposed a bar on the reception of any but the original instrument and forbade the reception of the secondary evidence. Section 36 only lifted that bar in the case of an original unstamped or insufficiently stamped document to which no exception as to the admissibility was taken at the first stage. It did not create any exception in the case of secondary evidence which a copy would undoubtedly be.[17]

The dictum in Satyawati v. Pallayya,[18] that "Section 36 will also apply when secondary evidence of an instrument not duly stamped had been wrongly admitted" is not a good law.

13. SECTIONS 17 & 49 REGISTRATION ACT AND SECTION 91 OF THE EVIDENCE ACT—EFFECT OF Section 17 of the Registration Act refers to documents which are required to be registered. Section 49 provides that such of those documents which require registration, if not registered, shall not affect any immovable property comprised therein and shall not be received as evidence of any transaction affecting such property.

The Privy Council in Moolla and Sons Ltd. v. Official Assignee Rangoon[20] held that the Indian Registration Act only requires certain documents to be registered on pain of the consequences entailed by Section 49 whereas the Transfer of Property Act by Section 54 enacts that with a limited exception the sale of immovable property can only be made by a registered instrument. The provisions of the Registration Act by themselves would not operate to render invalid a mere oral sale.

Section 49(c) of the Registration Act excludes receiving in evidence an unregistered document which is required to be registered under the Registration Act, whereas Section 91 precludes the proof of only the terms of the contract, grant or other disposition of the property. When a party does not rely on the unregistered document and if the terms of the disposition of property embodied in that document are not sought to be proved by other evidence, the bar contained in Section 49(c) of Registration Act and Section 91 of Evidence Act would not come into effect.[21]

Where a document, itself legally inadmissible in evidence, was subsequently referred to and partly incorporated in a second document of similar import duty executed between the same parties and registered according to law, it was held that the earlier document might be referred to for the purpose of explaining and amplifying the terms of the second, and of arriving at a correct conclusion as to the true nature of the transaction into which the parties had entered.[22]

Where a partition deed contained an admission of both parties that they were joint till 1954 and the parties wanted to show that there was an oral partition in 1951 it was held that the court should not persuade itself to hold that there was an oral partition between the parties in the face of the admission in the partition deed as it amounts to contradicting the recital in the document.[23]

In a suit to recover possession of certain property as joint undivided property the defendant relied on an earlier unregistered partition deed to show that the property in dispute was not joint but separate. It was held that the partition deed was admissible in evidence as it was not intended to prove its terms but all that the court had been concerned with was to find out whether particular properties claimed by the plaintiff to be joint family property were at the date of the suit joint or separate.[24]

The Gauhati High Court in Jabeda Khatun v. Moksed Ali[25] held that a gift under Mohammedan Law does not create a disposition of property, and so oral evidence to prove such a gift is not hit by Section 91 and the decision of the Supreme Court, in Bai Hira Devi v. Official Assignee Bombay[26] is of no help in respect of gifts by Muslims.

The Madras High Court had held that where the instrument of partition, being unregistered, cannot be admitted as evidence of the transaction, oral evidence to prove the terms of the agreement is barred.[27]

Where two brothers divided their properties movable and immovable under a Kararnama, an unregistered document, and there were counter documents showing that each brother gave up his claim in respect of the movable and immovable property, it was held that the oral evidence of partition was hit by Section 91 of the Evidence Act and could not be adduced to prove the terms of the partition when the document itself is inadmissible for non-registration.[28]

In Kale v. Dy. Director of Consolidation[29] the Supreme Court held that a family arrangement may be even oral in which case no registration is necessary. The registration would be necessary only if the terms of the family arrangement are reduced to writing. Here also a distinction should be made between a document containing the terms and recitals of a family arrangement made under the document and a mere memorandum prepared after the family arrangement had already been made either for the purpose of the record or for information of the court for making necessary mutation. In such a case the memorandum itself does not create or extinguish any rights in immovable properties and is therefore not compulsorily registerable.[30]

Assuming that the said document was compulsorily registerable, the courts have generally held that a family arrangement being binding on the parties to it, would operate as an estoppel preventing the parties from resiling from the same. Even if the family arrangement was not registered, it could be used for a collateral purpose, namely, for the purpose of showing the nature and character of possession of the parties in pursuance of the family settlement and also for the purpose of applying the rule of estoppel which flowed from the conduct of the parties who having taken benefit under the settlement, keep their mouths shut for full seven years and later try to resile from the settlement.[31]

It was held by the Supreme Court that a subsequent memorandum of partition embodying the factum of partition would be only a family arrangement and its registration was not necessary.[32]

Under the proviso to S. 49 of the Indian Registration Act, an unregistered document affecting immovable property and required to be registered may be received as evidence of a contract in a suit for specific performance, or as evidence of part performance of a contract, or as evidence of any collateral transaction not required to be effected by a registered instrument. The proviso is declaratory of what was previously the law. An unregistered document, though inadmissible as evidence of a transaction affecting immovable property, was admissible as evidence of collateral facts.[33]

A document required by the law to be registered, if unregistered, though inadmissible as evidence of transaction affecting immovable property, can be admitted for a collateral purpose.[34] It was held that an unregistered partition deed is inadmissible to porve the terms of the partition but can be admitted in evidence for a collateral purpose having regard to the combined operation of Section 49 of the Registration Act and Sections 91 and 92 of the Evidence Act.[35] The unregistered document can be looked into for a limited purpose to know the character and nature of possession of the party to the document.[36] In *N. Council held that the unregistered gift deed may be looked at to show the nature and character of possession held by the donee.[38] By an unregistered document, though inadmissible for want of registration, the transferee under the document can show by producing the document that he acquired title to the said property contained therein by continuing in possession for more than 12 years, i.e., by adverse possession. A party can prove his title by adverse possession and limitation for the suit by showing the starting point from the date of his unregistered partition deed.[39] An unregistered document may be used to prove an admission contained therein.[40]

This section does not exclude oral evidence in respect of the nature of the contract or oral agreement. When the witnesses supporting a claim of oral sale of property deposed about the execution of a document also at the time of the oral sale, but that document had not been registered, it was held that the bar under this section is not attracted for proving that oral sale.[41]

For a detailed discussion of admissibility under Registration Act for a collateral purpose reference may be made to the under mentioned decisions.[42]

For proving character and nature of possession, see.[43]

14. DEEDS

Oral evidence can be adduced to show that the recitals in a deed were nominal or were not intended to be acted upon or that they were not meant to alter the existing state of affairs.[44]

15. LEASE DEEDS

Under Section 17(1)(d) of the Registration Act leases of the immovable property from year to year or for any term exceeding one year or reserving a yearly rent shall be registered. Under Section 117 of Transfer of Property Act a lease for agriculture purpose need not be by any written instrument and may be oral. But, if the transaction is reduced to writing then the provision of Section 17(1)(d) of the Registration Act would come into play if the lease is from year to year for any term exceeding a year or reserving a yearly rent and the lease deed should be registered. If it is not registered it would be inadmissible u/Section 49 of the Registration Act.[45]

The Bombay High Court has held that an unregistered lease can be looked into for a collateral purpose for finding out whether the entry of the tenant into the land was as a permanent tenant.[46]

Where the lessees executed a registered Kabuliat in favour of the lessor and the lessor accepted it and executed an unregistered Amalnama it was held that there is no valid lease as defined in Section 107, T.P. Act created by the Kabuliat and acceptance of the lessor cannot be proved either by producing unregistered Amalnama or by oral evidence.[47] It was held that a registered Kabuliat by a lessee is invalid as a lease as it does not create any interest in the immovable property, but it could be looked into to know the possession of the lessee and neither Section 49 of the Registration Act nor Section 91 of the Evidence Act operates as a bar to the admissibility of the Kabuliat.[48] An unregistered Kabuliat granting a right to pluck mango fruits and Mahua flowers for three years was held not admissible in a suit for recovery of rent; as the Kabuliat does not create any interest as it was executed by lessee.[49]

In respect of a contract to transfer the leasehold right, it was held that the unregistered deed though inadmissible, can be used as evidence of possession in persuance of the document u/Section 53(a) of Transfer of Property Act.[50]

Unregistered lease for a period of some years cannot be received and the terms of it cannot be proved by other evidence.[51]

Oral evidence to prove a contemporaneous oral agreement that the lease deed was executed only as a voucher or security for the loan and was not to be acted upon can be admitted.[52]

In a suit filed by the lessee against a trespasser for ejectment, it was held that an unregistered lease can be admitted to prove possession of the lessee and acceptance of rent to show that he was a lessee since the terms of the lease deed need not be proved in such a suit.[53]

An unregistered Kirayanama (rent deed) for three years reserving monthly rent for residential purposes was held not operative as a valid lease and Section 91 is a bar to lead oral evidence.[54]

If the document is not admissible for want of registration, as a permanent lease still it can be looked into for showing the permissive nature of possession over the land.[55]

16. SALE DEEDS

A sale of property of value less than Rs. 100/- was effected by delivery of possession. There was also an unregistered document showing the transaction, it was held that the sale is complete by delivery of possession to the vendee and the unregistered document can be looked into whether the possession was given or whether the vendor was in possession.[56] Where the question of title and possession had become interdependent, the Court would not be justified in receiving and admitting into evidence the unregistered sale deed on the basis of which the defendant was claiming title.[57]

In a suit for declaration of title based upon permanent lease deed and a subsequent sale deed, when the documents were not produced and the affidavits of the plaintiff vendee and the vendor were filed to prove title, it was held that the title is not supported by legal evidence and oral evidence cannot be admitted.[58]

Where the terms of a contract or of a grant or any other disposition of the property (here sale-deed) have been reduced to the form of a document, oral evidence to prove that document could always be allowed. It is not prohibited under Section 91.[59]

17. MORTGAGE DEEDS

The Supreme Court held in Veeramachineni Gangadhara Rao v. Andhra Bank Ltd.[60] that when the parties creating security by deposit of title deeds intend to reduce the contract to writing, such document must be registered. If the document is not registered, neither the document could be used in evidence nor the transaction could be proved by oral evidence in view of Section 91.[61]

In such cases the criterion is whether the document constitutes the bargain between the parties or is it merely the record of an already completed transaction as was pointed out by LORD CARSON in Subramanian v. Latchman[62]. If the memorandum in question is the bargain between the parties and if it is not registered no evidence is permissible. And such unregistered document has to be rejected, the reason being, as observed by COUCH C.J., in Kedhar Nath Datt v. Shamlal Khetty,[63], that the writing is tacitly considered by the parties themselves as the only repository and the appropriate evidence of their agreement.[64]

Where the document in question is merely a list of title deeds and does not indicate the terms of the agreement or the nature of the matter, such document does not require registration.[65] Where the document merely records what had taken place and the circumstances in which the title deeds were deposited, it was held that such document does not require registration and does not exclude oral evidence of the mortgage agreement.[66] Where the mortgage was already effected by the deposit of title deeds and the subsequent memorandum was only a record of the completed transaction, such record does not require registration, oral evidence can be adduced in respect of the debt and Section 91 is no bar in such cases.[67]

The Supreme Court held that in the case of mortgage by deposit of title deeds the three requisites are (1) debt (2) deposit of title deeds (3) an intention that the title deeds shall be security for the debt which can be gathered from the documents or coupled with oral evidence or by oral evidence only.[68]

The question whether oral evidence is admissible to establish or explain the circumstances in respect of deposit of title deeds, would depend on the question whether the writing itself would constitute the bargain between the parties.[69]

A mortgage deed cannot be varied by any declaration made in an affidavit that the rights transferred were not merely of those of the mortgagor but of a full owner.[70] In the case of an unregistered deed creating further charge on the mortgaged property, the document is not admissible and no oral evidence can be given regarding its contents in view of Section 91 the Evidence Act.[71] It was held that an unregistered mortgage deed can be referred for ascertaining the nature and character of possession and for determining the quantum of interest agreed by the defendant.[72] The factum of a mortgage can be proved by independent evidence as it is not a term of the mortgage even though the mortgage is inadmissible for want of registration.[73] In the case of an oral mortgage where the sum secured is Rs. 100 or upwards it is invalid and no evidence is admissible to prove such a mortgage.[74]

WORT AG. C.J., and MANOHAR J., took a different view and agreed with the view taken in[75].

Where a firm is not registered under Partnership Act oral evidence is not admissible to show the terms of it.[76]

In the case of an anomalous mortgage when a suit was filed to recover the amount acknowledged by the mortgagee on his personal liability to pay the debt which term was severable from the property obligation as a security for the debt and when the suit was not for enforcing the lien over the property or for possession of property, it was held that though the mortgage bond was not registered it can be received in evidence in support of the claim on money basing on personal liability.[77]

An unregistered document can be availed of for the purpose of showing character and nature of possession, if such possession is transfered under such a document. When the mortgage deed is invalid in view of the provisions of Transfer of Property Act and is inadmissible in evidence in view of Section 49 of the Registration Act, there can be no question of a mortgage coming into existence, and so acquisition of rights by prescription on the basis of 12 years possession by the mortgagee would not arise under the invalid mortgage, and if it were to be allowed it would be clearly going against the provisions of a statute.[78] Where the document containing a transaction is inadmissible for want of registration no other evidence of its contents can be received. Where in a suit for redemption of land, the plaintiff alleged that possession was given to the defendant by way of security for a loan of Rs. 100 or upwards but no registered deed was executed to evidence the transaction, oral evidence to prove the transaction was held inadmissible.[79]

Where the government grant (Order) specifically stating that certain land be granted to particular Ziarat permanently and when the recitals are clear and express in unmistakable terms, it was held that oral evidence to contradict the recitals of the document is hit by Sections 91 and 92.[80]

Refering to LORD CARSONIS' view, LORD TOMLIN observed: "While their Lordships do not think that the language of LORD CARSON conveys or was intended to convey the meaning that no memorandum relating to a deposit of title deeds can be within Section 17 Registration Act unless it embodies all the particulars of the transactions of which the deposit forms part, their Lordships are of the opinion that no such memorandum can fall within the purview of Section 17, unless on its face, it embodies such terms and is signed and delivered at such time and place and in such circumstances as to lead legitimately to the conclusion that so far as the deposit is concerned it constitutes the agreement between the parties".[81]

18. FAMILY SETTLEMENT DEED

Where the terms of partition of family settlement between the parties have been reduced to writing in the registered deed of family settlement and has been proved, there is no question of any evidence in the nature of any oral agreement or statement in any suit for the purpose of contradicting, varying, adding to, or subtracting from the terms of the said deed of family settlement.[82]

19. LICENCE

Oral evidence to prove the contents of a licence is not admissible in evidence.[83]

20. CASES OF FRAUD

In cases of fraud on registration also this section does not apply. In cases of document required by law to be registered, where a party while selling or mortgaging one property situate in a particular district, added some nominal item situated in another district, to attract the jurisdiction of the other district for purpose of registration, evidence can be admitted and Section 91 is no bar, as such registration is a fraud on law according to Section 28 of the Registration Act and is invalid.[84]

Under the Amendment Act of 20 of 1929 the new Section 53-A was introduced in the Transfer of Property Act thereby introducing the equitable doctrine of part performance in a modified form, according to which the transferee cannot file a suit to enforce any right under the contract but he can only have a right to defend in order to protect his possession.[85] It was held that even if the transferee in possession loses his right to obtain specific performance of the agreement as such suit is barred by limitation, the doctrine of part performance can be availed as a defence in an action for ejectment filed by the transferor.[86] Oral evidence can be given to prove the existence of a document as contemplated in Section 53-A of the Transfer of Property Act as also secondary evidence of its contents under Section 65 of the Evidence Act.[87]

21. WRITTEN ORDER OF APPOINTMENT BY PUBLIC OFFICER NEED NOT BE PROVED [EXCEPTION 1]

This Exception is partly based on the maxim omnia praesumumtur rite esse acta. "It is a general principle, that a person's acting in a public capacity is prima facie evidence of his having been duly authorised so to do; and even though the office be one the appointment to which must have been in writing, it is not, at least in the first instance, necessary to produce the document, or account for non-production". "The admission on evidence contemplated in this exception rests "partly on the principle" that the law presumes in favour of the regularity of official acts and against misconduct and bad faith; and partly on the consideration that the invalidity of an act or appointment is more liable to detection when of a public, than when of a private nature."[88] Under exception (1) of Section 91 of the Evidence Act it is enough for the petitioner to prove that the successful candidate in an election acted as a patel, an office of profit under the Government and was therefore disqualified for standing as a candidate for election. It is not necessary to produce the order of appointment.[89]

22. WILLS ADMITTED TO PROBATE PROVABLE BY PROBATE [EXCEPTION 2]

Probate means the copy of a will certified under the seal of a court of competent jurisdiction with a grant of administration to the estate of the testator. (The Indian Succession Act (XXXIX of 1925). S. 2(f). Probate of a will is evidence of the contents of the will against all the parties interested thereunder. Probate is secondary evidence, but it is made admissible by this section.

Apart from the exceptions mentioned in this section, it is open to the legislature to provide in express terms exceptions to Sections 91 & 92 of the Act. For instance Section 12(1) of the Kerala Land Reforms Act provides that notwithstanding Sections 91 & 92 of the Evidence Act, it is open to prove that a document purporting to be a mortgage is in substance a kanom or a similar transaction granting fixity of tenure.[90]

23. NUMBER OF DOCUMENTS CONTAINING THE TERMS IMMATERIAL [EXPLANATION 1]

Illustration (a) to the section exemplifies this explanation. When parties negotiate at a distance by letters or telegrams, the entire mass of correspondence indicates the true nature of the agreement entered into by the parties.

"Instead of leaving the net effect of the negotiations to be gleaned from the mass of writings, a single document is finally drawn up to replace them and to embody their net effect, and is signed or otherwise adopted by the parties, this document will alone represent the terms of the act."[91]

Dealing with the evidentiary value of "bought and sold notes" it was held[92] that a broker is a common agent of both parties and when he closes the negotiation usually enters it in his business books and gives copy to each party of the entry or the memorandum of the transaction. The note or the memorandum given to the seller is called the "sold note" and the copy given to the buyer is a 'bought note'. They both do not constitute a contract of sale and they would serve only to record the transaction; in such cases the contract may be proved by any other legal means. Where the bought and sold notes did not agree and there being no other written memorandum of the contract there would be no sufficient proof within the Statute of Frauds.

In regard to "bought and sold notes" the Privy Council held that as the defendant had falsified the bought and sold note, the plaintiff was entitled to disregard them and to fall back on his original contract, that as regards the "bought and sold note" the only question is what weight should be given to them.[93]

24. ONLY ONE OF MANY ORIGINALS MAY BE PROVED [EXPLANATION 2]

Illustration (c) exemplifies the meaning of this Explanation. Section 62, Explanations 1 and 2, Bills of exchange and bills of lading have more originals than one.

25. STATEMENT, IN ANY DOCUMENT, OF A FACT, NOT REFERRED TO IN THIS SECTION PROVABLE [EXPLANATION 3]

Illustrations (d) and (e) exemplify this Explanation.

"When the contents of a document are in question, either as fact in issue or a sub-alternate principal fact, the document is the proper evidence of its own contents, and all derivative proof is rejected until its absence is accounted for. But when a written instrument or document of any description is not the fact in issue, and is merely used as evidence to prove some fact, independent proof aliunde is receivable." (BEST ON EVIDENCE, 2nd Edn., p. 282).

Thus, although a receipt has been given for the payment of money, proof of the fact of payment may be made by any person who witnessed it. A receipt for sums paid in part liquidation of a bond hypothecating immovable property must be registered to render it admissible as evidence. Under illustration (e) to this section such payments may nevertheless be proved by parol evidence, which is not excluded owing to the inadmissibility of the documentary evidence.[94]

TAYLOR ON EVIDENCE (10th Ed., Section 405, p. 314) states the principle of this explanation 3 as follows. "Extrinsic evidence is admissible in substitution of any document intended by the parties to operate merely as a collateral or informal memorandum of a transaction, and not as a contract or other binding legal instrument, because, in such a case, the parties do not intend the writing to be complete and exclusively operate as regards such transaction.

In a suit, which was brought for the price of goods sold and delivered, the plaintiff swore to the fact of the sale and tendered in evidence a written admission of the defendant that the goods had been supplied to him. The writing was rejected, as unstamped, and the suit was dismissed. It was held that the judge should have allowed the plaintiff an opportunity of proving by oral testimony the delivery of the goods sold, and their value.[95] So although where the contents of a marriage register are in issue and verbal evidence of those contents is not receivable, yet the fact of the marriage may be proved by the independent evidence of a person who was present at it.[96]

A contract deals with the subject matter as well as the persons between whom it is entered into. The names of the parties insofar as they relate to the terms, which create obligations cannot be regarded as divorced from the terms of the contract. Evidence may be led to show that some other persons intended to incur obligations under the contract instead of the parties designated therein, in view of explanation (3) of Section 91.[97]

In view of explanation (3) and illus. (e) of Section 91 Evidence Act, when the pronote was not produced, the plaintiff must prove that he had lent the money to the defendant and it was repayable; that for such purpose oral evidence is admissible of the fact that the payment was made; that the terms on which the payment is made are covered by the provisions of Section 91 and require production of the document.[98]

Exclusion of evidence of oral agreement.

S. 92. When the terms of any such contract, grant or other disposition of property, or any matter required by law to be reduced to the form of a document, have been proved according to the last section, no evidence of any oral agreement or statement shall be admitted, as between the parties to any such instrument or their representatives in interest, for the purpose of contradicting, varying, adding to, or subtracting from, its terms:

(d) A enters into a written contract with B to work certain mines, the property of B, upon certain terms. A was induced to do so by a misrepresentation of B's as to their value. This fact may be proved.

(e) A institutes a suit against B for the specific performance of a contract, and also prays that the contract may be reformed as to one of its provisions, as that provision was inserted in it by mistake. A may prove that such a mistake was made as would by law entitle him to have the contract reformed.

(f) A orders goods of B by a letter in which nothing is said as to the time of payment, and accepts the goods on delivery. B sues A for the price. A may show that the goods were supplied on credit for a term still unexpired.

(g) A sells B a horse and verbally warrants him sound. A gives B a paper in these words : "Bought of A a horse for Rs. 500". B may prove that verbal warranty.

(h) A hires lodgings of B, and B gives a card on which is written—"Rooms, Rs. 200 a month". A may prove a verbal agreement that these terms were to include partial board.

A hires lodgings of B for a year, and a regularly stamped agreement, drawn up by an attorney, is made between them. It is silent on the subject of board. A may not prove that board was included in the terms verbally.

(i) A applies to B for a debt due to A by sending a receipt for the money. B keeps the receipt and does not send the money. In a suit for the amount A may prove this.

(j) A and B make a contract in writing to take effect upon the happening of a certain contingency. The writing is left with B, who sues A upon it. A may show the circumstances under which it was delivered.

COMMENTS

1. PRINCIPLE AND SCOPE

(1) This section deals with several grounds of exclusion of extrinsic evidence.

Under this section

(1) When the terms of (a) a contract, (b) a grant, or (c) any other disposition of property, have been reduced to the form of a document, or

(2) When any matter required by law to be reduced to the form of a document has been proved by the production of the document or by giving secondary evidence of its contents, no evidence of any oral agreement or statement shall be admitted as between the parties to any such document or their representatives in interest, for the purpose of (i) contradicting, (ii) varying, (iii) adding to, or (iv) subtracting from, its terms.

There are six exceptions to this—

(1) Any fact which would (i) invalidate any document, or (ii) entitle any person to any decree or order relating thereto may be proved, such as fraud, intimidation, illegality, failure of consideration, mistake in fact or law.

(2) Any separate oral agreement (i) as to any matter on which the document is silent, and (ii) which is not inconsistent with its terms, may be proved.

(3) Any separate oral agreement, constituting a condition precedent to the attacking of any obligation under the document, may be proved.

(4) Any subsequent oral agreement to rescind or modify any such contract, grant, or disposition of property, may be proved, except when such contract or grant (i) is required to be in writing, or (ii) has been registered.

(5) Any usage or custom by which incidents not expressly mentioned in any contract are usually annexed to such contracts, may be proved if they are not repugnant to, or inconsistent with, its express terms.

(6) Any fact which shows in what manner the language of the document is related to existing facts, may be proved.

This section is supplementary to S. 91 and is, to some extent, implied in it. If the contract, grant or disposition has been reduced to writing, Section 91 says no evidence shall be given of it, except the document itself, and this rule would be in vain, unless, as is said in this section, it was also forbidden to contradict, vary, add to, or subtract from, its terms.[1]

1. Markby 73, Bhawanbhai Premabhai v. Bai Vahali, (1955) 57 Bom LR 250.

When a transaction has been reduced to writing, either by requirement of law, or agreement of the parties, the writing becomes the exclusive memorial thereof; and no extrinsic evidence is admissible either to prove independently the transaction, or to contradict, vary, add to, or subtract from, the terms of the document, though the contents of such document may be proved either by primary or secondary evidence.

All parol testimony of conversations held between parties, or declarations made by either of them, whether before, or after, or at the time of, the completion of a contract, will be rejected, because such evidence would tend to substitute a new and different contract for the one really agreed upon. Extrinsic evidence as to what transpired subsequent to a written contract is not admissible for ascertaining its terms.[2]

"To admit inferior evidence when the law requires superior would be to nullify the law; and that when the parties have deliberately put their agreement in writing, it is conclusively presumed between themselves and their privies, that they intend the writing to form a full and final statement of their intentions, and one which should be placed beyond the reach of future controversy, bad faith, or treacherous memory". Though on execution and registration of a sale-deed, the ownership and all interests in the property pass to the transferee, yet that would be on terms and conditions embodied in the deed indicating the intention of the parties. Such intention can be gathered by intrinsic evidence, namely, from the averments in the sale-deed itself or by other attending circumstances subject, of course, to the provisions of Section 92.[3]

The rule, however, is sometimes though to be based on the "best evidence" principle[4]; sometimes on the doctrine of estoppel, as the party is precluded by his acknowledgment in writing from disputing what is so acknolwedged; and sometimes on the substantive law purely. The rule applies when the document is accepted as a document operating in accordance with its terms.

Section 92 enacts that when the terms of all contracts, or grant or other disposition of property are reduced to writing, whether or not such contract or grant is compulsorily required to be reduced to writing and registered, no oral evidence shall be admitted to contradict, vary, add to or substract, from its terms.[5]

The section applies only where, upon the face of it, the written instrument appears to contain the whole contract.[6] If the parties have intended to reduce all the terms of the contract to writing, then no parol evidence is admissible; but if they intended only to reduce to writing a portion of the terms of the contract, then they are entitled to give parol evidence of the terms which they did not intend to reduce to writing.[7]

Where, however, a transaction is contained in more than one document the documents should be read and interpreted together and this section is not applicable.[8]

The bar of this section applies only when it is sought to be proved that the terms of the transaction were different and not that the transaction itself was different than what it purported to be.[9]

2. APPLICABILITY—EXCEPTIONS [SECTION 92]

It is given to the legislature by special legislation to exclude the operation of Sections 91 and 92. Section 12(1) of the Kerala Land Reforms Act, 1963 removes the trammels imposed by provisions of Evidence Act specially Sections 91 and 92 in the interpretation of documents. In cases, to which Section 12(1) will not apply, a document has to be interpreted subject to Sections 91 and 92 of Evidence Act.[10]

The provision contained in Section 6 of Hyderabad Land Alienation Restraint Act, is mandatory and cannot be whittled away. The policy of the Act being to create an exception to the general rule in Section 92, Evidence Act, any decree passed on admission of the defendant who is an agriculturist cannot come in the way of his raising a plea in any subsequent proceeding.[11]

The plea of estoppel under Section 115 of the Evidence Act would apply only when the representation is in writing, but would not help when it is oral in the face of Section 92. It is wrong to suppose that Section 115 is a substantive law, while Section 92 is only a procedural law. If the two are read together, both can operate. There is nothing in Section 115 to show that it overrides Section 92.[12]

However, it was held that the rule of estoppel must prevail against a pure rule of procedure contained in Section 92.[13]

An arbitration proceeding is not governed by the Evidence Act. In an arbitration proceeding, however, the principles of natural justice are bound to be followed. The principles embodied in Sections 91 and 92 of the Evidence Act lay down the principles of natural justice and the court in such a case of violation should come to the aid of the aggrieved party. In case reference proceeds and the arbitrator gives effect to the principle embodied in Sections 91 and 92 of the Evidence Act, the party who alleges the fraudulent manipulations in the written contract is bound to fail. Again, in case the reference proceeds, if the arbitrator ignores the principles of Sections 91 and 92 and the decision is in favour of the party and then the point is agitated in court, the court is bound to give effect to the principles of Sections 91 and 92 of the Evidence Act.[14]If evidence is proposed to be led to vary or modify the terms of a document or a writing, there must be a proper plea raised which brings the case within any of the provisions to Section 92.[15] This section has no reference to a question whether the parties agreed to the terms of the document set forth in it.[16]

Section 92 has nothing to do with offers made. It fully allows offers to be varied at the time of acceptance and being turned into regular contracts. Where a complainant seeks to prove the varying of the terms of offer at the time of concluding the contract, such evidence is not prohibited by Section 92 and hence cannot be excluded.[17] Where the agreement is partly oral and partly in writing the bar under Section 92 is not attracted.[18]

3. 'ANY MATTER IS REQUIRED BY LAW TO BE REDUCED TO'

Where any matter is required by law to be reduced to the form of a document, then the document itself must be put in evidence, e.g., deeds, conveyances of land, mortgages, wills, etc. No other evidence can be substituted so long as the writing exists. But where the matter is not required by law to be reduced to the form of a document, this section does not apply, e.g., in 1866 an oral agreement with transfer of possession sufficed to create a mortgage and, therefore, a mortgage could be proved aliunde even if there was no registered document.[19]

4. ADMISSION

The document wherein the party has made an admission and he has been confronted with the same in his examination, can be relied upon.[20]

5. CONFESSION

A confession of an accused person made to a Magistrate holding an inquiry is a matter required by law to be reduced to the form of a document within the meaning of this section, and no evidence can be given of the terms of such a confession except the record, if any, made under Section 364 of the Code of Criminal Procedure.[21]

6. DEPOSITION

In a prosecution for perjury, the deposition is to be produced in evidence against the accused during his trial not for the purpose of proving its truth but for the purpose of proving that he made it. Section 91, Evidence Act deals with the production of a document to prove the truth of its contents and not to prove its existence. If the prosecution had to prove that the deposition made by the witness is correct, it would have to produce the deposition and Section 91 would bar any other evidence. But when the prosecution has simply to prove that the witness made the deposition, there is nothing in Section 91 to prevent this fact being proved without producing the deposition itself.[22]

The omission to read over his deposition to the witness, in accordance with Order XVIII, Rule 5 of the Civil Procedure Code, renders the same inadmissible in evidence against him at his subsequent trial for forgery and oral evidence of its contents is excluded by this section.[23]

7. CONTRADICTING—INTENTION

The Privy Council laid down in Balkishen v. Legge[24] that oral evidence of intention is not admissible for the purpose of construing a deed or ascertaining the intention of the parties to the deed. Oral evidence was not allowed, for example, to show whether a particular deed was intended by the parties to be a sale or lease.[25] A deed of sale of land for value was accompanied by a deed of agreement between the parties for purchase back by the vendor of the land on payment by him of money to the vendee on a future date fixed. The deeds were followed by transfer of possession to the vendee, and his receipt of the profits. The vendor did not exercise his right of re-purchase; but after many years, gave notice of his intention to redeem, and sued to enforce his right of redemption as upon a mortgage by conditional sale. The Privy Council held that oral evidence for the purpose of ascertaining the intention of the parties to the deeds was not admissible and that the case must be decided on the consideration of the contents of the documents themselves with such extrinsic evidence of surrrounding circumstances as may be required to show in what manner the language of the document was related to existing facts.[26] Even after this pronouncement of the Judicial Committee there was a conflict of views between the Bombay and the Madras High Courts on the one hand and the Calcutta High Court on the other on the question whether oral evidence as to acts and conduct of parties subsequent to a deed was admissible to show that what on the face of it was a conveyance of sale was in reality a mortgage. The High Courts of Bombay[27] and Madras[28] were of opinion that such evidence was not admissible. The former Chief Court of Lower Burma[29] and the former Judicial Commissioner's Court of Upper Burma[30] followed this view. On the other hand, the Calcutta High Court[31] was of opinion that such evidence was admissible. The former Chief Court of the Punjab[32] had adopted the view of the Calcutta High Court. This conflict has been set at rest by the Privy Council in Maung Kyin's case, above referred to, in which it has expressly overruled the decisions of the Calcutta High Court and approved those of the Bombay and the Madras High Courts. It has held that as between the parties to an absolute conveyance this section precludes the giving of oral evidence to prove that the transaction was intended to be a mortgage.[33]

Though this section precludes oral evidence of intention for the purpose of construing deeds or proving the intention of the parties, it merely prescribes a rule of evidence, and does not fetter the court's power to arrive at the true meaning and effect of a document in the light of all the circumstances surrounding the transaction[34]. When it is said that a court should look into all the circumstances to find an author's intention, it is only for the purpose of finding out whether the words apply accurately to existing facts. But if the words are clear in the context of the surrounding circumstances the court cannot rely on them to attribute to the author an intention contrary to the plain meaning of the words used in the document.[35]

Where a document has to be construed, the intention must be gathered, in the first place, from the document itself. If the words are express and clear, effect must be given to them and any extraneous enquiry into what was sought or intended is ruled out. The real question in such a case is not what the parties intended or meant but what is the legal effect of the words which they used. If, however, there is ambiguity in the language employed, then it is permissible to look to the surrounding circumstances to determine what was intended.[36]

8. ORAL EVIDENCE INADMISSIBLE TO CONTRADICT WRITTEN TERMS

In a suit for a declaration that an apparent sale-deed executed by the plaintiff was a mortgage and for redemption, the lower courts allowed the plaintiff to adduce evidence to prove that the defendant at the time of the execution of the sale-deed represented to the plaintiff that the sale-deed would not be enforced as such. It was held that no evidence of a contemporaneous agreement, or promise, or representation inconsistent with the written document could be admitted.[37] In a suit for a decree for sale for the mortgage due under an admittedly usufructuary deed mortgage the defendants contended that there was a contemporaneous oral agreement to treat the usufructuary deed as a simple mortgage and that transfer of possession was never intended. On the question whether evidence in support of the oral agreement could be allowed to be let in, it was held that the Courts should give effect to the intention expressed in the document and that the contemporaneous oral agreement was inadmissible in evidence.[38] Where in a written agreement of sale, the relevant clause therein expressly contemplated that the possession would remain with the vendor until completion of the sale, oral evidence to prove an oral agreement pertaining to handing over the vacant possession of the ground floor of the building in question, thereby contradicting the written agreement, was held to be inadmissible.[39] Where a registered document on the face of it without any ambiguity is a pure and simple mortgage, the parties to the transaction or their successors-in-interest cannot be allowed under Section 92 to prove by parol evidence that it was intended to operate as a deed of sale.[40]

In the case of ambiguous language of a document admitting variety of meanings, the court can consider subsequent conduct of the parties.[41]

Where a document purports to be an absolute sale, a contemporaneous unregistered agreement giving the vendor the right of redemption is inadmissible to prove that the deed of sale is in reality a mortgage.[42]

The Privy Council held reversing the judgment of the High Court that Section 92 barred parol evidence for the purpose of showing that a deed of sale was in reality intended by the plaintiff to be deed of gift.[43]

The plaintiff's father conveyed the family properties to his sister's husband for a stated amount as consideration, the consideration being the obligation which the vendee undertook to discharge the family debts for that amount, and the vendee sold some of the properties and discharged the debts, and the plaintiff sued the vendee for the recovery of the properties left, and for an account of his management of the properties conveyed. It was held that the plaintiff was precluded from establishing an oral agreement to reduce an out-and-out sale into a trust so as to take away the right of the vendee to enjoy the properties, as such an agreement would be hit by this section.[44]

Evidence to show that a possessory mortgage is in reality a simple mortgage according to the intention of the parties is inadmissible under this section.[45]

In Sara Veeraswami v. Talluri Narayya[46] the registered sale deed executed by the appellant plaintiff and his father effected an out right and unconditional sale of certain properties. On the same day the vendee leased the properties in favour of the father-in-law of the appellant-plaintiff. At the same time there was an oral agreement of sale that if the price was paid by the plaintiff within a period of five years, the vendee agreed to reconvey the properties. The plaintiff filed the suit for reconveyance. The Privy Council held that the oral agreement as to reconveyance did not contradict, vary or subtract from the terms of the sale deed within the meaning of Section 92 and was therefore admissible in evidence. The Privy Council also held that the words "adding to" which are part of Section 92 must receive their due weight, but in the opinion of their Lordships they do not suffice to exclude the oral agreement relied upon by the appellants. It is, of course, literally correct to say that as the agreement for reconveyance related to the lands sold, it added a further stipulation respecting those lands. That, however, is not an appropriate test of the applicability of the section which is concerned to defeat the modification of a particular document. It is not enough to ask if the oral agreement relates to what has been sold. To be excluded it must bear, in some one or more of the ways specified in the section, upon the terms of sale a contained in the instrument. To add a stipulation which is quite unconnected with the terms of sale is not, in the view of their Lordships, an addition of the kind struck at the section.[47]

Evidence in respect of an oral agreement to return the property which has been conveyed under a registered sale deed is inadmissible.[48] Section 92 bars proof of an oral agreement not to charge interest when the mortgage bond in its terms provided for payment of interest.[49] Where the partition deed contains an admission that the parties were joint till 1954, oral evidence that there was an oral partition in 1951 cannot be allowed.[50]

In a suit for redemption of registered Zarpeshgi of 1929, the defence was that by an oral settlement of the same land in 1942 with the defendants they had discharged the liability under the Zarpeshgi of 1929. It was held that oral evidence to prove the oral settlement in discharge of the Zarpeshgi of 1929 could be admitted because this was a case of total extinguishment of the Zarpeshgi and not a case in which the subsequent transaction set up by the defendants amounted to or had the effect of varying or rescinding the agreement between the parties resulting in the transaction of Zarpeshgi of December, 1929. In such circumstances, of course the law requires that when the original contract is in writing it may not be proved to have been abrogated except by a document in writing but this is altogether different from an arrangement between the parties subsequent to a contract whereby accepting the rights and liabilities accuring thereupon they seek to fulfil the obligations arising therefrom and thereby discharge the liability of one party as against the other; that would be an extinction of the previous contract by performance and not by concealing it or avoiding it. This is the distinction between the two.[51]

However, the Calcutta High Court in Ramavtar v. Tulsi[52] held that a subsequent oral agreement giving a diffrent mode of payment of discharge or providing a means for the satisfaction of the amount under the mortgage by putting the mortgagee in possession of the property mortgaged or a portion of it to enjoy the profits therefrom, oral evidence can be permitted to prove such oral agreement.[53]

A plea that, notwithstanding the recitals in the promissory note for interest, the parties at the time of its execution agreed that no interest should be charged comes within the mischief of Section 92. It is a collateral agreement altering the legal effect of an instrument.[54] An agreement as to implied warranty regarding the correctness of the extent of the property sold should be established on the terms of the sale deed and it is not open to the plaintiff to travel outside the deed and to adduce to prove that there was a warranty de hors the instrument.[55] Mere mention of commission in a contract is not in any way inconsistent with the relation being between principal and a principal and statement of the defendant contradicted by the plaintiff that it was a condition that there was to be no liability on their part, cannot be allowed to displace the ordinary results which a contract between principals entails.[56] Once it is admitted or proved that a party executed a sale deed, no oral evidence can be led for contradicting, varying, adding to or substracting from its terms unless a case falling under any proviso to Section 92 is specifically pleaded.[57]

The Supreme Court in Mahindra and Mahindra Ltd. v. Union India[58] while disapproving of the decision in Hindustan Lever Ltd. v. M.R.T.P.[59] observed: "Sections 91 and 92 of the Evidence Act do not come into the picture at all while considering whether a particular trade practice set out in an agreement has or may have the effect of preventing, distorting or restricting competition so as to constitute "a restrictive trade practice; it is the actual or probable effect of the trade practice which has to be judged in the light of the various considerations and there is no question of contradicting, varying, adding to or substracting from the terms of the agreement by admitting any extrenuous evidence for that purpose".

Where in a petition for eviction of one S and the appellants from the shop on the ground that S who, was the tenant of the shop in his personal capacity, had unlawfully sublet the shop to a firm, oral evidence was led by the appellants before the rent controller that S had acted as an agent on behalf of the firm of which he was a partner. It was held the description of a person in the lease as 'lessee' or 'tenant' does not necessarily negative agency and evidence may be given that the person so described was acting as an agent.[60]

In Leena Roy Choudary v. Most. Indumati Bose[61] a suit for eviction by a landlord was compromised between the landlord and tenant. According to the compromise decree the tenant gave up possession of a part of the premises. Thereafter tenant constructed a kitchen, a permanent structure without the landlord's permission. Compromise did not expressly authorise the construction of the kitchen. Hence landlord again filed a suit for eviction. It was held that the construction of a permanent structure namely kitchen without the permission of the landlord is a breach of conditions of tenancy contained in Section 108, T.P. Act. The covenants set out in Section 108, T.P. Act are implied in every lessee in the absence of a contract or local usage to the contrary. It was further held that merely because the terms of the lease are contained in a document, Sections 91 and 92 of the Evidence Act would not prohibit the Court from importing into the lease the covenants or conditions implied in Section 108, T.P. Act.

A provision of law is neither a statement of a witness nor a document produced for inspection of Court. In importing the conditions of Section 108 the Court is not admitting any evidence.

There is nothing in Section 92 which prohibits the Court from considering the evidence regarding other terms and conditions which are not in conflict with the terms of the contract, if the document does not record or purport to record all the terms of the contract between two parties. The plaintiff's own oral evidence is admissible to establish the defence case of invalidity of the document concerned.[62]

It is open to a judgment-debtor to plead a pre-decretal agreement which does not attack the decree but which states that the decree cannot be executed under certain conditions or it can be executed only in part. Such an agreement is not affected by Section 92, Evidence Act, as it does not amount to a modification, alteration or variation of the decree.[63]

In a case of a possessory mortgage and rent note, where the rent was equivalent to the interest on the mortgage, where the mortgagor filed a suit for eviction and arrears of rent, and the mortgagee contended that there was no relationship of landlord and tenant, as the two documents constituted a single transaction of mortgage. It was held that the bar of Section 92 applies only when it is sought to be proved that the terms of the transaction were different and not that the transaction itself was different than what it purported to be. Both Sections 91 and 92 are based on the best evidence rule. Section 92 is only supplementary to Section 91. If there is no inconsistency and if the language of the document is not ambiguous or obscure and the case does not fall in any of the six provisos to Section 92, the document would have solely to be construed on its own terms. The oral evidence as regards intention would therefore always be admissible to prove the real nature of the transaction. The real question being what is the true nature of the transaction, the same would have to be found out by looking at the contents of the document, the surrounding circumstances and by resorting even to the oral evidnce of the parties. Looking at the rent note there were two different relationships with two different legal consequences and following the rule of harmonious construction, both the documents could be given effect to at the same time. When there was no inconsistency, there could also be no question that earlier part of the transaction, viz., the mortgage would prevail over the subsequent part, the lease, because both the parts could be given effect to. In such a case there would be no room for application of any of the provisos to Section 92 and the bar would remain absolute. The documents must be construed on their terms.[64]

The rights of the legatees under a will cannot be established by varying or adding up to the terms of agreement by adducing oral evidence.[65]

9. DISCHARGE OF LIABILITY

Where a suit was filed on the basis of a demand pronote, the defendant pleaded a collateral agreement to receive the usufruct of certain plots in repayment of the debt, it was held that oral evidence of the collateral agreement to prove the discharge of liability was admissible.[66] Where a partnership was formed by a registered deed for five years oral evidence to prove dissolution of the partnership much earlier and payment to the partners or one of the partners in accordance to their respective share was held admissible.[67] If the oral agreement does not contradict the main terms of the written contract but a change is made as to the mode of discharge of his obligation to suit the convenience of the parties, it is not hit by Section 92.[68] In a suit to enforce a mortgage, it is open to the mortgagor to plead discharge on the basis of an oral agreement by which the mortgagee undertook to take a portion of the mortgaged property for sale in full discharge for the mortgage debt.[69] When a mortgagee filed a suit for sale of mortgaged property, an oral agreement was set up stating that some persons interested in the plaintiff brought about an agreement that mortgage amount should be settled for Rs. 9,000/- and a certain portion of the mortgage property should be sold to the plaintiff, in full discharge of the claim, it was held that the mortgagor (defendant) can adduce oral evidence in proof of oral agreement.[70] Where in the case of a simple mortgage the parties by a subsequent oral agreement, put the mortgagee in possession of the mortgaged lands for recovery of interest, it is merely an agreement creating a machinery for discharging interest and it is not hit by Section 92.[71]

When the separate agreement does not have the effect of varying or contradicting or adding to the terms of the deed between the parties, oral evidence is permissible. But, if it varies, contradicts or adds to the terms of the deed, oral evidence cannot be permitted.[72]

10. VARYING

The executant of a promissory note cannot be permitted to prove a separate agreement according to which the sum specified in the note was not, as expressed therein, payable on demand, but only after the adjustment of some accounts between the parties.[73] This case has been dissented from in a subsequent case in which the same High Court held that evidence to show that an instrument like a promissory note, the title to which generally passes by delivery, was delivered conditionally or for a special purpose only, and not for the purpose of transferring absolutely the property therein, is not only admissible but is precisely the class of evidence contemplated by Section 46 of the Negotiable Instruments Act and this section.[74] No oral evidence is admissible to vary the amount of price fixed in a registered sale-deed,[75] or the terms of a cheque which is a negotiable instrument[76] or the rate of interest different[77] from that in the written contract. An out and out gift cannot be altered by oral evidence into a will which has to take effect after the death of the donor, as it amounts to varying the term of the gift which comes into existence as and when the deed is executed.[78] It is not open to a party to a document to prove by oral evidence a variation in the terms of the document or as to the amount of consideration shown in the document. The oral agreement would then amount to a modification of the original contract and is inadmissible under Section 92.[79] Tenure or period of service or employment being an express term in writing any oral evidence contradicting or varying the same is not admissible.[80] Proof of implied warranty must rest on the terms of the sale deed and it is not open to travel outside the deed.[81] One member gave security for a loan raised by other members of a joint family, describing that the property belongs to him. It was held that no oral evidence can be given to vary the recital by showing that it was joint family property.[82] Under Section 128, Contract Act, the liability of a surety is co-extensive with the principal debtor, unless otherwise provided in the contract. Oral evidence is inadmissible to show that one of the executants was only a surety.[83] The Rangoon High Court has dissented from this view and held that oral evidence to show that one of the executants of a monetary bond to the knowledge of the money-lender signed it only as a surety is not admissble.[84] The Privy Council has held that oral evidence is inadmissible to show that the person who has signed a promissory note is not liable but someone else is[85]. Oral evidence was not allowed to contradict the contents of a written deed of liability to a bank.[86]

If in a suit based on promissory note the court finds that substantially the plea taken by the defendant is a variation of the terms of written contract viz., the promissory note, oral evidence to prove the plea is excluded. If, however, the plea amounts to a complete discharge then perhaps oral evidence relating to discharge is admissible and the matter will have to be gone into on that basis.[87]

Where a lease deed is in favour of X and Y, Section 92, of the Evidence Act, 1872, is clearly a bar to the plea by X that Y is merely a surety.[88]

One of the executants cannot also show that his liability would arise only on the failure of the other executant to pay the amount.[89]

The words 'between the parties to any such instrument' do not preclude one of two persons in whose favour a deed of sale is purported to have been executed from proving by oral evidence in a suit by the one against the other, that the defendant was not a real but a nominal party only to a purchase, and that the plaintiff was solely entitled to the property to which it related. M conveyed certain houses and premises to plaintiff and defendant jointly by a sale-deed. Plaintiff sued defendant for ejectment from the premises, alleging that he alone was the real purchaser, and that the defendant was only nominally associated with him in the deed. It was held that this section did not preclude the plaintiff from showing by oral evidence that he alone was the real purchaser, notwithstanding that the defendant was described in the sale-deed as one of the two purchasers.[90] An oral agreement not to execute a decree, entered into between the parties after the filing of the suit and before the passing of the decree, provided the defendant did not contest the suit, is admissible in evidence as it does not vary the terms of the decree, and can be pleaded in bar of execution.[91]

In Kochu Varki v. Cochin Thirumala Devaswam[92] the land leased comprised of partly garden land and partly paddy lands. A suit was filed for the lease amount. In respect of garden lands, the lease amount was claimed. One of the contentions raised was that there was no "pattom" fixed in respect of the garden land separately. The Devasthanam contended that pattom was fixed in respect of garden land and paddy land separately though it was not so mentioned specifically in the contract of lease and referred to both oral and documentary evidence. The defendant wanted to show that the pattom shown in the document was the sum total of the pattom separately fixed in respect of, garden and paddy lands and how it was arrived at. It was held that this did not amount to varying, contradicting, adding to or substracting from the terms of the document and hence it was held Section 92 was not a bar.

Varying the terms of mortgage deed by unregistered deed for seeking possession would be of no avail as the said unregistered deed would not be admissible.[93]

11. ADDING TO

The Privy Council in Sara Veeraswami v. Narayya,[1] while approving Harkisan Das Bhagwan Das v. Bai Dhanu[2] and the decision in Ma Nan Shein v. U. Yaing[3] at page 494 in[4] observed: "In their Lordships' opinion the correct way of stating the proposition is to say that the agreement reached covered several matters but that the intention was that each of these should be effected as a separate and independent transaction. There was to be an outright sale and that, upon the happening of a certain event, was to be followed by a reconveyance of what had been sold. The second transaction, by its very nature, promised the previous completion of the first. Both, it is true, may be taken as arranged at the same time and agreement upon the part of the bargain may well have promoted agreement as to the rest, but such considerations do not necessarily affect the final result of the bargaining. The determining factor lies in the ultimate shape of the agreement rather than in the process by which it is reached. An oral stipulation may be purely collateral to the written agreement which it has induced, and that though both touch on a common subject matter—such being the character of the agreement in question—their Lordships find it impossible to hold that it contradicted, varied, or substracted from the terms of the sale deed. On the contrary, it left those terms and the interest passing thereunder to the purchaser entirely unaffected. Can it then be said to have added to the terms of the sale deed? The words "adding to" which are part of Section 92, must receive their due weight, but in the opinion of their Lordships, they do not suffice to exclude the oral agreement relied upon their appellant. To add a stipulation which is quite unconnected with the terms of sale is not, in the view of their Lordships, an addition of the kind struck at by this section.[5]

An agreement as to implied warranty regarding the correctness of the extent of the property sold should be established on the terms of the sale deed and it is not open to the plaintiff to travel outside the deed and to adduce evidence to prove that there was a warranty de hors the instrument.[6] In an agreement to sell joint family property, signed by a member of the joint family, there was no stipulation that the person signing the agreement would get the sale deed signed by the brothers also. Oral evidence to add this fact to terms of agreement was held to be barred by Section 92.[7]

Where prior to the execution of the sale deed it was agreed between the parties to the deed that the purchaser would pay the amount of taccavi loan due from the vendor to the Government in case it was recovered from him but there was no reference to this agreement in the deed of sale and a suit was brought to enforce the agreement, it was held that proviso (1) to Section 92, did not apply to the case as no question of want or failure of consideration of the deed of sale arose; nor was proviso (2) applicable as the deed was not silent on the point of consideration. The court could not, therefore, go behind the deed of sale which embodied the terms and enforce the agreement.[8]

Specific performance is an equitable relief and the contract of which specific performance is sought, must be precise and no oral evidence is admissible to add to the terms or contents. If the terms are uncertain it must be held as void under Section 29 of the Contract Act.[9]

12. ITS TERMS

The question whether oral evidence can be admitted to explain contents of document depends upon the degree of formality of document.[10]

The expression 'terms' of a contract in Section 91 and the corresponding expression in Section 92 have no application to a statement, contained in a writing which is in the nature of a condition precedent to the very formation of that contract.[11]

Normally, a person, who subscribes to a deed must be bound by all the recitals contained therein. Nevertheless, a lessee is not precluded from showing that despite the recitals to the contrary in the deed of settlement to which he is a signatory, he was not put in possession and occupation of the lands which he took under the settlement. Nor is the lessor precluded from showing that he had not received his outstanding part of the nazrana money due from the lessee although the deed contained a recital that it had been paid by the lessee.[12]

Where a person enters into a contract for purchase of an agricultural land for building purposes on the representation of the seller that the permission of the authorities for conversion of the land to building sites was expected shortly, the representation cannot be regarded as a term of the contract and therefore, oral evidence as to the representation cannot be excluded.[13] A recital in the sale deed concerning encumbrances is not a term of the sale deed and therefore, evidence to prove that the purchaser was aware of defect is not inadmissible under Section 92.[14]

13. NATURE OF THE DOCUMENT

In Tyagaraja Mudaliyar v. Vedathanni,[15] it was held that if the parties to a written agreement, wish to establish that they never agreed to contract on the terms set forth in the document, or that they did not intend to act upon the document, oral evidence could be adduced to establish the same.[16]

It is open to A to prove that he executed a sale deed benami in favour of B in order to defeat the claims of a creditor. In such a case, if the contemplated fraud was not carried out and was not effected in whole or in part, there is nothing preventing the plaintiff from repudiating the transaction as being benami and recovering possession of the property. In such a case, the question is not one under Section 92 regarding proof of a collateral oral agreement under which B is to hold the property for the benefit of A but is really a case where the transferor seeks to establish by attendant circumstances that he did not intend by his deed to dispose of the beneficial interest in the property to the transferee and that therefore he must hold the property for his benefit.[17] Where there is no dispute that the actual contract between the parties was one recorded in the deed, it is not thereafter open to the parties to let in oral evidence to prove that its terms were different from what is contained in the deed. Section 92 precludes such a course. But it does not preclude the parties from showing that the real nature of the transaction was different from what the document purports to show.[18] Parol evidence is admissible to show that a contract embodied in a document was never intended to be acted upon but was made for some collateral purpose.[19] Oral evidence to prove that deed was not to operate as agreement but was brought into existence for creating evidence of such matter, is permissible.[20] In order to attract the provision of Section 92, there should be a contract in existence. When a party pleads that there was no contract at all or that an instrument which had been brought into existence earlier was only a sham one not intended to be acted upon, it would be open to him to establish by oral evidence that there was no intention on the part of the parties to bring into existence a contract or an effective document.[21] Sections 91 and 92 do not preclude a party from giving evidence to show that the written agreement executed was never intended to operate as an agreement, but was brought into existence solely for creating the evidence of some other matter, or there was no agreement between the parties and there was no valid contract as per the terms of embodied therein.[22]

As a broad and distinct rule of law, extrinsic evidence of every material fact which will enable the court to ascertain the nature and qualities of the subject matter of the instrument or to identify the persons and things to which the instrument refers, must be necessarily received.[23]

It is open to a party to prove that a particular transaction was not consented to by him; Section 92 excludes oral evidence to vary the terms of the written contract, but has no reference to the question whether the parties agreed to contract on the terms set forth in the document.[24]

One cannot be allowed to show that a pronote was not really executed in favour of the plaintiff or that he discharged the debt by payment to another really interested.[25] But in the case of partnership, where its partner executed a pronote in his own name, it was held that the promisee can show an independent contract to bind all the partners and the normal rule that the maker can only be held liable is not applicable.[26]

Section 92 does not exclude oral evidence to prove that the transaction evidenced by a written instrument is fictitious or benami or was not intended to be acted upon and was executed to defeat the claims of some creditors and it was not intended by his deed to dispose of the beneficial interest in the property to the transferee.[27]

However it was held, that it is not open to the parties to prove that a lease is a benami transaction as the same would amount to varying the terms of the contract itself.[28]

It is submitted that this decision is contrary to the decision of the Privy Council in Thyagaraja's case and also to an earlier bench decision of the Patna High Court.[29]

Regarding the question whether the document was a sale or mortgage oral evidence regarding the intention of the parties is not permissible.[30] Evidence is not permissible to show that a deed was intended to be a mortgage deed though it purported to be a sale deed.[31] Section 92 does not preclude defendant from showing by oral evidence that rent mentioned in rent note was only device for payment of interest on loan as interest was in contravention of Section 25(2) of Bombay Money Lenders Act of 1947.[32] Extraneous evidence to prove that the deed of gift is not what it purports to be cannot be admitted in evidence.[33]

The subsequent conduct of a transferee in dealing with the transferred property may be relevant only if it is of material assistance in establishing the nature of the transaction or the intent of the transferor in entering into that transaction. But subsequent conduct may also be the result of a subsequent change in design in which case such subsequent conduct will not adversely affect the validity and genuineness or minimise or nullify the operative effect of a bona fide transaction made earlier.[34] Though oral evidence of intention is excluded under Section 92, which prescribes a rule of evidence, it does not fetter the court's power to arrive at the true meaning of a document in the light of all the circumstances surrounding the transaction [35] The rule as to "surrounding circumstances" cannot be excluded to enable a party to prove that when he wrote one thing he meant something totally different [36]

In case the validity is impeached the court is not precluded from inquiring into the real nature of the transaction between them. The proviso declares that any fact may be proved which would invalidate any document [37] Where a document showed that the transfer of property was by sale, but Section 92 is no bar to prove it to be not a sale but a gift or family arrangement.[38] If a sale and agreement to reconvey are not embodied in one and same document, the seller is not precluded from showing that transaction was not an out and out sale.[39]

Where the language of the written instrument evidences an outright and unconditional sale, oral evidence to show that it was only intended to operate as a mortgage or a trust deed is not admissible, as it would amount to contradiction, variation, addition or substraction from the written grant.[40]

14. SURROUNDING CIRCUMSTANCES

The question whether the document is a mortgage by conditional sale or a sale with condition for retransfer, is one of determination of real character of the transaction to be ascertained from provisions or document viewed in light of surrounding circumstances.[41]

The evidence of the surrounding circumstances under which the document was brought about may, be given to show that the transaction is not what it appears to be and that the apparant tenor is not its real character.[42]

Where any part of the consideration has not been paid to the vendor, and the property is not delivered to the vendee and the sale deed is in the custody of the vendor himself, it cannot be held that the title to the property has passed to the vendee, as there are telling circumstances to show that it was not the intention of the parties that title would pass irrespective of non-payment of consideration.[43]

Evidence of contemporaneous conduct is always admissible as a surrounding circumstance but evidence of subsequent conduct of the parties is inadmissible.[44]

Extrinsic evidence can be considered in construction of a sale deed.[45]

It was held that under Section 5, Mysore Agriculturists' Relief Act, plaintiff can show that alleged usufructuary mortgage was a simple mortgage.[46]

15. TERMS

(a) Benami transaction.—This section applies only to the terms of a transfer and does not preclude the admission of any evidence to show the benami character of the transaction.[47] The Supreme Court allowed oral evidence to show that the real tenant was someone other than the ostensible tenant.[48] Section 92 does not exclude oral evidence to show who are real contracting parties as they are the authors of the terms of the contract and not the terms.[49] When the question is whether under the terms of contract, a contracting party acted for himself or as agent for some other principal, Section 92 does not apply and parol evidence is admissible.[50] A contract note is not conclusive of the real relation of the parties to the contract and evidence can be given to prove whether a party contracted as agent or in the capacity of seller or buyer in the transaction.[51]

Where a particular place in a route is or is not covered by permit has to be determined by the Transport Authority by having recourse to the permit itself. Oral admission by the operator on this matter is inadmissible, unless he is entitled to give secondary evidence of the contents of the permit.[52]

A different view has been taken in the under mentioned cases where a party makes an agreement in writing in his own name and contributes his signature, he cannot produce evidence to show that he merely acted as a third party's agent and the plaintiff had knowledge of the same.[53]

Contract.—Oral agreement to liquidate the loan under the pronote from out of the usufruct of the land possession of which was given to plaintiff, can be proved to show the discharge of the loan under proviso 3 to Section 92 if it is not a case of a collateral agreement when by the plaintiff would be compelled to recover the consideration in a way different from the recitals in the promissory note in which case the oral agreement would be inadmissible as contrary to the terms.[54] A usufructuary mortgagee has a right to show that he has not been put into possession of the mortgaged property.[55] It does not prevent a party to a contract from showing by oral evidence that the consideration is different from that described in the contract. It is therefore open to a party to show that the part of the consideration as to rent payable in terms of a lease represented a past debt for rent and not a future liability arising under the contract.[56] Oral evidence can be adduced as to what exactly was the nature of consideration.[57] It is open to establish by evidence that the consideration was really different from the consideration recited in the deed as it is not a term of the sale deed.[58]

Proving absence or failure of consideration is different from proving different amount of consideration i.e., something other than what was mentioned in the document. In the latter case evidence is not permissible as it will contradict the term regarding consideration. But in the former case it is not so; under Proviso 1 evidence may be adduced to prove want or failure of consideration. This is however, totally distinct from the amount of consideration. A statement in a document that a consideration has been paid is really a recital in a deed and does not constitute one of the terms of the contract. But the amount of consideration is obviously a term of the sale deed and, therefore, it is not open to a party to prove a variation in the amount of consideration.[59] Section 91 and 92 are a complete ban to any party to set up a case that the consideration for the sale is more than what was mentioned in the document, when it is not the case of the party that the consideration was not paid or that there was failure of consideration or the consideration agreed between the parties was of different kind than what was mentioned in the document.[60] The recital in a sale deed that there are no encumbrances on the property sold is not a term of contract and evidence to prove that the vendee was aware of certain liability on the property and purchased it subject to such liability is admissible.[61]

Where the document consists of two parts namely, one, preamble or preliminary recital of a past fact and the other relating to terms of disposition of property. Section 92 of the Evidence Act prohibits only the varying of terms of the documents, not the memoranda or recitals of facts, bereft of dispositive terms, particularly when the correctness of the whole or any part of the recital is in question. It is settled law that a clear intimation by a co-parcerner to the other co-parcerner of his intention to sever the joint status need not be in writing. For these two fold reasons, the bar in Section 92, Evidence Act against the admissibility of extrinsic evidence for the purpose of showing that the insertion of the words 'for your maintenance' in the recitals was wrong, unreal, unmeaning and the coinage of the executant's own brain is not attracted.[62]

Oral evidence of intention is not admissible in interpreting the covenants of the deed but evidence to explain or even to contradict the recitals as distinguished from the terms of the documetns may, of course, be given.[63]

These words when read with the words "as between the parties to any such instrument" which follow them, refer to bilateral instruments only and not to unilateral instruments, such as wills and powers-of-attorney. Oral evidence as to the 'terms' of a written contract is excluded. There is nothing to exclude oral evidence that there was no agreement between the parties and therefore no contract.[64]

Plaintiffs sued for specific performance of an agreement in writing, which set forth, inter alia, that defendants had agreed to sell, etc., under "certain conditions as agreed upon". The defendants alleged that the written agreement did not contain the whole of the agreement between the parties and offered parol evidence in support of their contention. It was held that the parol evidence was admissible to show what was meant by the clause "certain conditions as agreed upon".[65]

Section 92 applies only to concluded contracts and has nothing to do with negotiations before a written contract is concluded. Even if there is a concluded contract, it is always open under Section 92 provisos 2&6 to show how the terms of a document are related to the existing state of things.

Where a document was a record of the terms of a validly concluded contract for sale between the parties the fact that it was described and called as receipt was immaterial. It was held, further that the document did not preclude the vendor from showing that the parties did not agree as to one of the terms in the sale deed and that there was no completed contract and the plea might either fall under proviso 3 or it might be taken as a plea not covered by Section 92 at all, namely that there was no contract at all.[66]

If a hath-chitha is one, which contains only an acceptance of a liability and promise to pay a previous debt, there is no escape from the conclusion that it is an informal document, which need not contain all that had been agreed to between the parties. Therefore, it was open to the plaintiff to lead evidence to show a contemporaneous agreement between the parties in respect of payment of interest.[67]

Section 92 does not debar the party to a contract from adducing evidence for the purpose of contradicting recitals of facts mentioned in the document. The bar imposed by this section applies only when a party seeks to rely upon the document embodying the terms of transaction. Consideration cannot be said to be a term of contract though it is interwoven with it.[68]

The mere fact that both the parties have not signed a contract will not make the agreement oral within the meaning of Ss. 91 and 92, because these sections only require the terms to be reduced to writing and not the whole contract in the sense of signatures and dates and so forth. Even where signatures are absent on an agreement or the proposal and acceptance are not entered in it, it would still be hit by Ss. 91 and 92 provided the "terms" meaning all the terms, are embodied in the written agreement. The absence of signatures could be used as good evidence of the fact that the document was not intended to be final and binding. But the mere absence of signatures would not prevent the document from being the final depository of the intention of parties, any more than the presence of signatures would operate to bind if it could be established that the signing was conditional.[69]

(b) Deed of adoption.—Where a party admits the existence of a deed of adoption and of its non-production in the court, his admission would not render oral evidence inadmissible to prove the adoptions it is not by virtue of the deed of adoption that a change of status of a person is effected. The adoption deed is only a piece of evidence and the failure of party to produce such a document does not render oral evidence in proof of adoption inadmissible.[70]

16. APPLICABILITY TO DECREES

Section 92 cannot refer to a decree which is imposed upon one of the parties by force. Then is no mutuality about a decree which is passed in accordance with the wishes of one party and contrary to the wishes of the other. Section 92, therefore, cannot bar the setting up of a pre-decretal oral contract.[71]

17. WILLS

It was held that a registered will can be revoked by an unregistered will and Section 92(4) is no bar, as the will is neither a contract nor a grant nor a dispossession of property and it operates only after the death of the testator.[72]

18. 'HAVE BEEN PROVED ACCORDING TO THE LAST SECTION'

The provisions of the section come into force when the written instruments referred to in the section have been proved in accordance with the provisions of S. 91, that is, either by the production of the document itself, or by the production of the secondary evidence of it.

Court can, on facts and circumstances of a case, consider whether two or more documents formed part of one and the same transaction and construe them accordingly.[73]

19. SURETYSHIP

A loan transaction was contained in more than one document, a pronote by three including one B and deed of hypothecation, by two were executed in favour of a bank. It was held that both the documents are to be read together to satisfy the conditions of Section 126 of the Negotiative Instrument Act and that B was a surety and not a co-obligant as he was not setting up any oral agreement in derogation of the pronote and Section 92 did not apply.[74]

It is open to the parties to a sale deed reciting the consideration as Rs. 1000/- to prove that the consideration was more than thousand relying on a prior agreement of sale in writing as what is precluded is only an oral agreement under Section 92.

Evidence was sought to be adduced by answers to interrogatories which contained an admission. Such evidence was held to be not admissible in evidence in view of Section 92 as the same is at variance or in contradiction of the terms of the registered document.[75]

This section is applicable only to cases as between parties to an instrument or their representatives-in-interest. Where, however, the dispute is between a stranger to an instrument and a party to it or his representative in interest, this section is inapplicable, and both the stranger and the party or his representative are at liberty to lead evidence of oral agreement notwithstanding the fact that such evidence, if believed, may contradict, vary, add to, or subtract from, its terms.[76] A stranger can show by oral evidence that the document is void or not valid. The section forbids the admission of evidence of an oral agreement for the purpose of contradicting, varying, adding to, or substracting from, the terms of a written document as between the parties to such document or their representatives in interest. The rule of exclusion laid down in the section does not apply to the case of a third party who is not a party to the document. On the contrary, S. 99 distinctly provides that persons who are not parties to a document may give evidence tending to show a contemporaneous agreement varying the terms of the document[77]. Extraneous evidence to show that the parties to a sale-deed had no intention of conveying a particular item of property included in the deed is admissible where the person challenging the transfer is not a party to the deed.[78] Where the grantee took knowing that a third person was the owner of the property and the grantor was only a mortgagee, and that the intention of all parties was merely to transfer the mortgage, oral evidence of the third party's rights was admissible to prove the real nature of the transaction.[79] Section 92, Evidence Act, excludes the admission of any oral agreement or statement as between the parties to an instrument or their representatives-in-interest, the pre-emptor in a pre-emption suit is not such a party. Hence, the provisions of Section 92 have no application.[80] In a suit for declaration that certain properties were joint family properties of the plaintiff and their deceased father and their father had no right to dispose of the property by will, documents were executed by the father reciting that there was no property of the joint family; it was held evidence to contradict the recital in the documents was not precluded by Section 92 as the dispute in the suit did not arise between the parties to the documents but between persons who claimed under the executant of the document.[81]

It is not open to the parties on the one side of the document, to prove as against each other that the document was a mortgage though it purports to be a sale.[82] Where a father executed a sale deed in favour of his daughter, the daughter contended that it was a gift in her favour but the father contended that it was a benami sale deed, it was held that oral evidence was admissible to prove that it was a gift, as the father and daughter could not be treated as parties contracting with each other.[83] Where an official assignee filed a suit for declaration that the gift deed executed by the insolvant in favour of his sons, as void, it was held that official assignee can lead oral evidence as he was not a party to the document nor a person representative in interest of the insolvant; the donees who are not contracting parties to the document can lead evidence to show it was a transaction for consideration as they are outside the scope of Section 92. The representative-in-interest of the insolvent can avoid the application of Section 92 and are entitled to lead oral evidence in support of the plea raised by them.[84]

A subsequent purchaser from a party who was the vendor in a prior sale deed of the very same property will be a representative-in-interest of his said vendor within the meaning of Section 92, of the Evidence Act and he would be precluded from contending that the first sale deed was only a mortgage and not a sale deed.[85]

The words "between the parties to any such instrument" occuring in Section 92 properly speaking, refer to the persons who come together to make the contract and do not apply to questions raised between the parties on one side only of a deed regarding their relations to the other under the contract to show that one of them is only nominally added as purchaser and the other is the real purchaser entitled solely to the property.[86] The section is limited to a party to a document. It, therefore, cannot be invoked by a person who is not party to a declaration made under Cl. 2 of Proviso of Goa, Daman and Diu (citizenship) Order, 1962 for preventing the maker thereof from producing evidence to vary its terms, though the declaration is a matter required by law to be reduced to writing in the form of a document.[87]

Section 92 does not bar a party to a sale deed as against a third party to the document from letting in oral evidence to show that the real consideration was different from what was shown in the sale deed.[88] Plaintiff sued to recover one-fourth of the price of a house alleged to have been sold by the first defendant to the second defendant, the claim being based upon a local custom. The transaction between the defendants was ostensibly not a sale but a usufructuary mortgage. It was held that the plaintiff, not being a party to the transaction, was entitled to give evidence to show that what purported to be a usufructuary mortgage was not in reality such, but was in fact a sale.[89] Where both grantor and grantee are dealing with the property of an owner who is a third person and not, in the language of Section 92, either party to the instrument or a representative-in-interest of a party to the instrument, there is no bar under Section 92 as to the admissibility of the evidence which is sought to be led in regard to the real nature of the transaction between the original parties.[90]

The sub-section is not attracted when the case of a party is that the transaction recorded in the document was never intended to be acted upon at all between the parties and that the document is a sham. Such a question arises when the party asserts that there was a different transaction altogether and what is recorded in the document was intended to be of no consequence whatever. For that purpose oral evidence is admissible to show that the document executed was never intended to operate as an agreement but that some other agreement altogether, not recorded in the document, was entered into between the parties.[91]

20. ANY FACT WHICH WOULD INVALIDATE ANY DOCUMENT [PROVISO (1)]

This proviso applies to cases where evidence is admitted to show that a contract is void, or voidable, or subject to reformation, upon the ground of fraud, duress, illegality, etc., in its inception[92]. See illustrations (d) and (e). The instances given in the proviso are not exhaustive. They are set out by way of illustration only. If the validity of a written agreement is impeached, it is no defence to point to the apparent rectitude of the document and to claim protection from inquiry under a rule which exists against the contradiction and variance of the terms only of those instruments the validity of which is not in question. In such cases, the Court is not bound by what has been described as the mere paper expressions of the parties and is not precluded from inquiring into the real nature of the transaction between them. The proviso declares that any fact may be proved which invalidates any document.[93]

In TAYLOR'S EVIDENCE (10th Ed., Section 1135, P. 814) it is stated "The rule contained in the section is not infringed by the admission of parol evidence, showing that the instrument is altogether void, or never had any legal existence of binding force, either by reason of forgery or fraud or of illegality of the subject-matter, or for want of due execution and delivery.....", "Parol evidence may be given to show that the contract in writing was really made for objects forbidden by law, that such writings were obtained by improper means as duress, that the party was incapable of contradicting by reason of some legal impediment, such as infancy, coverture, idiocy, insanity, or intoxication; or that the instrument came into the hands of plaintiff without any absolute final delivery by the obligor or party charged." (at page 816).

PHIPSON ON EVIDENCE (15th Ed. (2000), para 42-33, page 1182) states "Extrinsic evidence is admissible to prove any matter which by substantive law affects the validity of a document, or entitles a party to any relief in respect thereof, notwithstanding that such evidence tends to vary, add to, or, in some cases contradict the writing, e.g. defective or conditional execution, contractual incapacity, fraud, forgery, duress, undue influence, illegality of subject-matter, mistake, or want or failure of consideration".

Receipt of notice under Section 80, C.P.C. was acknowledged by defendant. If the defendant wants to prove that it was defective it is for the dependent to produce the notice and show that it does not fulfil the requirements of law. The contents of the notice cannot be proved by oral evidence in view of Section 92.[1]

Oral evidence to invalidate a document is admissible to show that document was never intended to operate according to its terms.[2]

In Venkata Rama Rao v. Appa Rao[3] it was held that if the question which has to be decided, is the intention of the parties, evidence must be admissible. If that evidence shows that the document did not relate to the land within the jurisdiction of the Sub-Registrar who registered it, such evidence tends to render the document invalid, as it amounts to fraud on registration law and so such evidence is admissible u/proviso 1 of Section 92.[4]

Evidence to show that a person who signed as a partner is not a partner and he signed on behalf of another who was the only partner is not admissible. Proviso 1 and 6 are not applicable were the language of the document (partnership deed) are clear.[5]

The illustration in this proviso 1 is not exhaustive by the use of the words "such as".[6]

Oral evidence of the witnesses in the proceedings of the Board in a Court Martial case are admissible in evidence.[7]

21. FRAUD AND MISREPRESENTATION

It has been observed that it would constitute fraud only where either there has been a promise made without any intention of performing it or where there has been an active concealment of fact by one having knowledge or belief of the fact.[8]

Under Proviso (1) to Section 92 only a fact which would invalidate a document such as fraud can be proved which clearly means the fraud as committed in the execution of the document or that a document which was not intended to be executed was executed fraudulently in favour of the defendants.[9]

In cases of fraud the important thing that has got to be proved is the intention to defraud. It would constitute fraud only where either there has been a promise made without any intention of performing it or where there has been an active concealment of fact by one having knowledge or belief of the fact.[10] Where one party induces the other to contract on the faith of representations made to him any one of which is untrue, the whole contract is in a Court of Equity considered as having been obtain ! fraudulently.[11]

In order to plead fraud effectively the particulars of fraud must be given by the party, and in the absence of such particulars, there cannot be any proper averment of fraud. The fraud which is alleged must be such as enters into the transaction itself and enables the party to avoid the transaction. It must be fraud within the meaning of the term as used in S. 17(3) of the Indian Contract Act, and unless and until the allegations amount to that, there cannot be any valid plea of fraud which can be taken up by a party.[12]

The section does not prevent proof of a fraudulent dealing with a third person's property or proof of notice that the property purporting to be absolutely conveyed in fact belonged to a third person who was not a party to the conveyance.[13]

Where one party to a contract does not agree to any of its stipulations and the other party induces him, not indeed to agree to it, but to agree to its formal insertion in the written contract, by representing that the stipulation in question would be in reality treated by him as a dead letter, it cannot be enforced because the party induced had never assented to it and its inclusion in the written contract was the result of misrepresentation[14]. Where, at the time of executing a document, a representation is made that the document though in form a sale-deed will not be enforced as against the executant as a sale-deed, and where on the faith of that representation the executant executes the document, the sale-deed cannot be upheld as a sale-deed as against him.[15]

The fraud which is contemplated by Proviso 1 of Section 92 is at the very inception a fraud which vitiates the transaction itself, and not any subsequent conduct or representation of the party or his representative-in-interest, which, however reprehensible it may be, is not enough to vitiate the transaction. Evidence of such conduct or representation cannot be led under the proviso. It must be fraud within the meaning Section 17(3) of the contract Act.[16]

When fraudulent mis-representation was pleaded, oral evidence is admissible to prove it.[17] In a case relating to an agreement to sell the seller pleaded that the agreed consideration was more than the stated one in the agreement. He admitted all the other terms in the agreement and did not allege any misrepresentation or fraud. He led no evidence except his oral testimony as to the value of the property. The valuation of the property given by the seller himself in a loan application belied his case. It was held that he had failed to prove that the agreed consideration was higher.[18]

Extraneous evidence apart from the compromise petition was admissible for the purpose of proving fraud. In most of the cases of fraud it can be established only by introducing extraneous conditions and circumstances.[19]

22. ILLEGALITY

Oral evidence is admissible to prove that the real object or consideration of an agreement in writing is unlawful and that therefore the agreement is void.[20] (Section 23 of the Indian Contract Act).

23. WANT OF DUE EXECUTION

The term 'execution' means the last act or series of acts which completes a document. It is formal completion of a document. Thus, execution of deeds is the signing, sealing and delivery of them in the presence of witnesses. Execution of a will includes attestation[21]. Writing, stamp, registration, attestation are all formalities necessitated by statutes.

24. WANT OR FAILURE OF CONSIDERATION

Want of consideration, or failure of consideration, or difference in the kind of consideration may be proved. But parol evidence to vary the consideration is not admissible.[22] The want or failure of consideration contemplated by the proviso is a complete want or failure of consideration.[23] It was held that it is open to a party to what was nominally a sale deed for consideration to show that no consideration did pass, and that what was a nominal sale was a real gift.[24] Though the sale deed may recite that the consideration has been paid, this is nothing to prevent the parties from adducing evidence to show that the recital is untrue and in fact the consideration was not paid.[25] Statement of a fact in a written document is not a term of the contract and hence would not come within the purview of Section 92 and oral evidence may be given to prove that the amount mentioned in the document to have been paid, has not been paid.[26]

If this was not so, facilities would be afforded for the grossest frauds. It is no infringement of this section for a Court to accept proof that by a collateral arrangement between the vendor and the purchaser, the consideration money remained with the purchaser under the conditions agreed upon between them[27]. The section does not say that no statement of fact in a written instrument may be contradicted by oral evidence, but that the terms of the contract may not be varied[28]. Where a part of the sale consideration is on the face of the document still outstanding and to be paid by the vendee, it is not open to him to produce evidence to show that there was a separate contemporaneous oral agreement that this sum would not be payable and was merely fictitious[29]. The amount of sale consideration is a term of a deed of sale and no evidence of any oral agreement can be given for the purpose of varying the amount. An agreement made without consideration is void except in the three cases specified in S. 25 of the Indian Contract Act. When it is brought to the notice of a Court that the consideration for a contract which it is asked to enforce is, in whole or in part, an unlawful consideration, such Court is bound to give effect to the fact thus brought to its notice, notwithstanding that the contract may appear upon the face of it to be a perfectly legal contract, and that the unlawfulness of the consideration was never pleaded by the defendant.[30]

Where in a suit for possession the plaintiff based his title on a registered sale deed executed in his favour and the defendant based his title on subsequent sale deed in his favour alleging that the previous sale deed in favour of the plaintiff was without consideration and that the same was subsequently cancelled by the vendor, it was held that the onus was on the defendant to prove the absence of consideration for the sale in favour of plaintiff, the defendant having admitted the execution of the sale deed.[31] It was held that proviso (1) to Section 92 did not apply to the case as no question of want or failure of consideration of the deed of sale arose.[32] Evidence of failure of consideration can always be adduced under proviso 1 of Section 92 passing of consideration in a document is not a term of the contract.[33] If it appears on the face of the document that the consideration is no more than nominal, evidence can be given to show the real circumstance and the true consideration.[34]

Where a renewed pronote was executed for the amount due under a prior pronote, the defendant was allowed to prove that he paid some amount under the prior pronote and thereby to that extent his liability under the renewed pronote should be proportionally reduced.[35] The Karnataka High Court held that it is permissible to prove either that no consideration as set out in the document had been received or that a portion thereof above had been received.[36] Evidence to show that non-receipt of consideration is admissible.[37] In the case of Shahjog Hundi under Section 118(a) of Negotiable Instrument Act, the defendant was held entitled to prove want or illegality of consideration.[38] Where in the documents executed in connection with the contract for sale there was a recital with regard to the payment of earnest money by the plaintiff to the executant, it is open to the defendants successors-in-interest of the executant, in a suit for specific performance, to show that the payment of earnest money was never made. In order to explain how and why that amount was not paid it is open to plead a collateral oral agreement to the effect that the amount was to be paid by the plaintiff not in cash to the executant but to the mortgagee of the property and in fact no such payment was ever made by the plaintiff either to the executant or to the mortgagee.[39] Though the sale deed recited that the consideration was paid, there is nothing to prevent the parties from adducing evidence to show that the recital is untrue and that in fact the consideration was not paid, and such evidence is not barred by Section 92 of the Evidence Act.[40] In a pre-emption suit intention of the parties can be gathered from the evidence led by the parties as well as their conduct in terms of Section 92 of the Evidence Act, the vendor is not prevented from adducing evidence to show that recitals in the said deed to the effect that consideration has been paid is incorrect and in fact no consideration was paid to him.[41]

Evidence may be admitted to prove that there was mutual mistake in the working of an agreement and to prove what the real intention of the parties was, and such evidence as to the alleged mistake may be given not only in a suit for the rectification of the mistake brought under S. 31 of the Specific Relief Act, but also in a suit based upon the agreement itself.[42] The combined effect of this proviso and S. 31 of the Specific Relief Act is to entitle either party to a contract, whether plaintiff or defendant, to protect his right by proving a mistake in a written contract i.e., a mistake in the description of the property sold by given a wrong survey number to the same. Mistake in the belief of a party to a document may be pointed out under this proviso.[43]

Under the terms of the proviso (1) of the Section 92, it will not be competent for the party to a contract to prove the variation of the consideration recited in the consideration.[44]

25. MISTAKE OF FACT

A mutual mistake relating to the survey number in the document, can be corrected by allowing evidence.[45]

Where by a written contract A sold goods to B to arrive 'Ex Peerless, from Bombay' and there proved to be two ships of that name each party intending a different one, extrinsic evidence was allowed to show that the parties were not really ad idem.[46]

A party who has entered into a wrong contract and thereby represented to the other parties to the document that he intends to be bound by the terms thereof is not entitled to give evidence that in fact he intended something else. If that were so, there would be no finality in written contracts.[47] The Court can act on the intrinsic evidence on the face of the document itself that there was a mutual mistake. The parties can also prove about their concurrent intention at the time of execution of the document and that it failed to give effect to their concurrent intention.[48]

The mistakes contemplated in this section are genuine and accidental mistakes just as misdescription of property. Evidence can be allowed to know whether a particular land was conveyed under the document.[49]

Though oral evidence can be admitted for correcting, a typing error which have crept in while expressing the contract between the parties, if it would amount to changing the entire contract, in interpreting the word parol evidence cannot be given. In the instant case it was found that for the word "sock" the word "rock" was typed, it was a typographical mistake and held that it can be corrected.[50] It is open to the Court to allow oral evidence of mutual mistake of fact to vary the terms of a deed. Oral evidence will be admissible even if the mistake is due to innocent misrepresentation.[51] A mistake induced by innocent misrepresentation by the opposite party comes within the proviso. Where a document written a language which a person could not read was signed by him on a assurance by the opposite party that it contained all the terms agreed upon but in fact it contained only some of the terms. It was held that oral evidence was admissible to prove the terms agreed upon and not contained in the memorandum.[52] Where a promissory note stated that the interest was payable at the rate of rupees two per mensem and in a suit on the promissory note the plaintiff contended that the interest agreed upon was two per cent, per mensem and that the words "per cent" had been omitted by mistake, it was held that oral evidence was admissible to prove that the rate of interest agreed upon was two per cent, per month.[53]

The proviso is not limited in its application to a suit for rectification of instrument. A defendent may plead and prove any mistake in the expression of the contract notwithstanding that he had not filed a suit for rectification and can resist a suit on the ground that what was sold to him was different from what the document described. Oral evidence is thus admissible to prove the same.[54]

Where it is established that there was a mistake as to the description of the property in the sale deed, a third person, who being aware of such mistakes and intending to take advantage of it, subsequently purchases that property from the original vendor, cannot plead that he acquires his right in good faith in answer to a claim made by the first purchaser.[55]

A person who seeks to rectify a deed upon the ground of mistake must be required to establish, in the clearest and most satisfactory manner, that the alleged intention to which he desires it to be made conformable, continued concurrently in the minds of all the parties down to the time of its execution, and also must be able to show exactly and precisely the form to which the deed ought to be brought[56]. The mistake referred to in proviso (1) refers to both unilateral as well as a mutual mistake.[57]

However a different view was expressed in the under mentioned cases. The mistake which can be proved by oral evidence under this proviso must be one which would found a claim for rectification of cancellation of the instrument. Since unilateral mistake is not a grant, for rectification or cancellation evidence of such a mistake does not come within the proviso.[58]

Oral evidence is admissible to fill a blank which has been left in the document by fraud or mistake.[59] Oral evidence is admissible to prove that the name of A in a document is mistaken for the name of B.[60]

Under the Indian Contract Act an agreement is not voidable because it was caused by a mistake as to any law in force in India, but a mistake as to law not in force in India has the same effect as a mistake of fact (s. 21). But Courts do relieve against mistakes in law as well as mistakes in fact, in cases where there is some circumstance which makes it inequitable that the party who has received the money of other party should retain it.

26. PRINCIPLE, SCOPE OF THE PROVISO (2)—ORAL AGREEMENT CONSISTENT TO TERMS OF DOCUMENT

This proviso 2 has to be read with illus. (f), (g) & (h).

In TAYLOR'S Evidence (10th Ed., Section 1049, P. 929). It is stated "The rule as to the inadmissibility of parol evidence to vary the terms of a document is not infringed by proof of any collateral parol agreement, which does not interfere with the terms of the written contract, though it may relate to the same subject- matter.....The rule as to the exclusion of parol evidence to vary written instrument does not prevent parties to a written contract from proving that, either contemporaneously or as a preliminary measure, they entered into a distinct oral agreement on some collateral matter".

Under this proviso evidence of any collateral parol agreement which does not interfere with the terms of the contract may be given. See ills. (f), (g) and (h). Parties can prove that, either contemporaneously or as a preliminary measure, they entered into a distinct oral agreement on some collateral matter. The only case in which oral evidence will be admitted under this proviso is where the instrument is silent on the matter sought to be proved and the agreement to be proved is consistent with the terms of the document. It is allowable to urge an oral agreement which will have the effect of leaving matters otherwise than if they had depended on the written agreement alone, but such oral agreement must be clearly proved and the onus lies on him who sets it up.[61]

Proviso (2) to Section 92 authorises the Court to admit and go into oral or other evidence for the purpose of explaining the real intention of the parties to the documents.[62]

Where the plaintiff agreed on an oral agreement to advance a certain amount to one H on some specified dates and H along with another defendant had to execute a pronote, and accordingly he advanced money and H and another defendant executed the pronote acknowledging the debt, it was held that evidence of such an agreement was admissible under proviso (2) of Section 92, being a separate agreement on a matter on which the pronote was silent and not inconsistent with its terms.[63]

Where the document does not record all the terms of the contract between the parties, oral evidence is admissible to explain the real nature of the transaction.[64] An incomplete agreement was entered into in terms of a Court decree, external evidence was allowed to supply its missing links.[65]

If there is a rule of law which requires the transaction to be in writing, any separate agreement must also be in writing.

The amount of the price agreed to be paid is an essential term of a contract of sale; and consequently no evidence of an oral agreement at variance with the provisions of a registered sale-deed as to the amount of the price fixed for the sale is admissible[66]. Evidence that a sale-deed was not intended by the parties thereto to be operative for the purpose of passing title is inadmissible[67]. This section does not bar oral evidence to transactions which were intended to be something else.[68] The two vendees in a transaction can vary the contents as between themselves.[69]

Where parties enter into a sale-deed, it is not competent to them to prove a contemporaneous oral agreement to reconvey the property sold on payment of the sum advanced, in the absence of fraud, misrepresentation, or failure of consideration, etc., rendering the sale invalid.[70]

27. ON WHICH THE DOCUMENT IS SILENT

Sections 91 and 92 do not bar giving evidence of a separate oral agreement when parties enter into a written agreement on one matter and a separate oral agreement on another matter.[71]

Oral evidence is permitted by the proviso-2 as to "any matter" on which the document is silent. Any separate oral agreement as to such matter should not be inconsistent with "the terms" of the document. Hence, if consideration is to be regarded as one of terms of the transaction, no oral evidence under the proviso-2 can be permitted of a matter which would be to any extent inconsistent with the said terms of the document. If document actually states or sets out the consideration for the contract or for the transaction, it is not permissible by oral evidence to contradict, vary add to or substract from the same. It is of course permissible to prove either no consideration as set out in the document had been received or that satisfaction has been received in respect of consideration in a manner otherwise than set out in the document. But those are matters, which come more appropriately under the first proviso.[72]

When there is a document in writing which does not contain the entire agreement between the parties, but embodies only some of the conditions, oral evidence to prove some other terms which had been agreed upon and which are not inconsistent with the written instrument is clearly admissible in evidence.[73]

It is well-settled that where the document is a formal one no oral evidence relating to any contemporaneous agreement inconsistent with the terms of the document would be permitted. The same cannot however be said in respect of an informal document. If a hath chitha is one, as in the present case, which contains only an acceptance of a liability and promise to pay a previous debt there is no escape from the conclusion that it is an informal document which need not contain all that had been agreed to between the parties. Therefore, it was open to the plaintiff in the present case to lead evidence to show a contemporaneous agreement between the parties in respect of payment of interest.[74]

Where a separate oral agreement pleaded by the party, was on a distinct and collateral matter, although it might have been a part of the same transaction, and if the instrument was silent on that point which is the subject matter of the agreement, such oral agreement would fall within the proviso (2), and oral evidence is admissible.[75]

28. DOCUMENT SILENT AS TO CERTAIN MATTERS

Where there was a contract in writing that the defendant having a tea estate has to supply Pasupara 'A' dust for 12 months but was silent as to the quantity to be supplied every month, it was held that Cl. (i) of the contract providing for the sale of the entire out put of Pasupara 'A' dust produced in the estate for 12 months had reference to whatever was produced as a dust, subject to the exercise of the discretion under clause IX of the contract given to the defendant to make any portion of the tea produced into leaf grade. A fixation of the quantity of Pasupara 'A' dust to be supplied to the plaintiff would, therefore, be inconsistent with the express liberty given to the defendant under Cl. (ix). Hence, the oral agreement was inadmissible in evidence.[76] Where a contract of sale is alleged to be by sample and the contract reduced to writing between the parties is silent about a sample being exhibited or about the quality conforming to a sample shown at the time of the contract, no evidence can be given to determine whether the contract was by sample.[77] A mortgage deed reciting that entire consideration money was received by mortgagor. The mortgagee admitted that only part of it was paid to the mortgagor. Extrinsic evidence was held admissible to prove that a duty was cast on mortgagee to pay off dues of mortgagor as the document was silent on the point.[78] Document has to be treated as a mere acknowledgement when it is silent as to interest. Hence oral evidence as to interest should be allowed.[79] Where a member of Hindu Joint Family executed an agreement to sell joint property, oral evidence is admissible to prove the character of the execution i.e., the member executed the document as Karta of the family, when the agreement itself is silent on the point.[80] Where cattle seized from the accused were put in safe custody of another person who undertook that he will produce them when so ordered by court, pending the trial and there was no provision for expenses for keeping cattle, it was held oral understanding to that effect can be proved under Section 92, Proviso 2.[81] Where a deed of transfer is silent on the point of consideration, parol evidence may be allowed to be given in order to show that the transfer was for consideration.[82]

Where an agreement of partnership is silent as to the liability to pay income-tax due in respect of the profits of the partnership, Section 92, Evidence Act, would not prevent the partners from proving that the intention was that the tax should be paid on the individual profits of the partners and not on the profits of the business.[83]

29. IMPLIED WARRANTY

Though there was a written contract between the parties, it contained nothing which exempted B from his liability for breach of contract with regard to the quality of goods. An oral agreement which contained the guarantee of quality and formed a separate agreement was held admissible in evidence under Section 92, Proviso 2 of the Evidence Act.[84]

When a registered mortgage deed did not mention any kind of interest simple or compound, it was held that the mortgagee, was not prevented from showing that the interest was compound and he is entitled to plead on oral agreement and to prove on the strength of the account stated that the interest agreed upon between the parties was really compound. It was held that that would not be a variation of the original mortgage bond but would be an independent agreement.[85]

Where a deed of possessory mortgage also provides for a lease back to the mortgagor on a monthly rent corresponding to the monthly interest on the mortgage debt and a rent note is executed giving effect to the lease, effect must be given to each deed according to its terms and the court can not by reading the two together spell out a transaction totally different in character. Their being component parts of the same transaction does not mean that the two deeds are inconsistent with each other. Nor are the circumstances that rent is liable to be appropriated towards interest, which like rent was payable every month, inconsistent with the transaction being a lease. Thus, in a suit for eviction by the mortgagee based on the rent-note which is executed as a sequel to the mortgage deed, it is not open to the mortgagor to plead that he is not in fact a tenant.[86]

A lessee under a registered lease wanted to prove an oral agreement regarding his preferential right to purchase the leased property if it was brought for sale. The lease was silent on the point. It was held that under Section 92, evidence of such a collateral contract, if there were such, would not be excluded, though it would be strange to omit such a condition if it had been agreed.[87]

30. NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS

Where a promissory note was silent as to where money under it was payable and evidence was sought to be given on that point, it was held that the proviso-2 of Section 92 allowed proof of any separate oral evidence about any matter on which a document was silent and which was not inconsistent with its terms. The creditor was, therefore, entitled to prove that the parties agreed that the promissory note was to be paid at a specified place.[88]

Where on the date of execution of a pronote, there was collateral agreement giving ten months time for repayment of the debt, it was held that under Section 63 of the Contract Act an agreement to give time is operative in India and the English decisions to the contrary were inapplicable.[89]

An agreement is not admissible in evidence when there is no stipulation regarding interest on the hundi (promissory note). In such cases the payee of the hundi is entitled only to interest at the rate of six per cent, per annum as provided by S. 80 of the Negotiable Instruments Act[90]. If there is a collateral written agreement, fixing the rate of interest in accordance with the custom prevailing in the district, the interest is recoverable at the rate agreed upon between the parties.[91]

Where the customers of a bank used to overdraw from their account and give a letter in a printed form agreeing to pay interest on the daily balances in the account and the fact that the bank charged compound interest with monthly rests was shown in their pass books, it was held that Section 92 would not prevent from proving an agreement to pay compound interest which could be implied from the customers long acquiesence in such a method of calculation of interest.[92]

A receipt which purported to show that simple and not compound interest was to be charged (though the mortgage-bond contained provision for the payment of compound interest), was held to be admissible in evidence[93]. The receipt did not require registration and was therefore admissible in evidence. It operated as a waiver.

31. AND WHICH IS NOT INCONSISTENT WITH ITS TERMS

Where there was an oral arrangement between the parties to a mortgage, to the effect that the mortgagee was to be put in possession of the mortgaged property and the profits arising from it should be taken in satisfaction of the interest, it was held that such an oral arrangement did not vary contradict, add to the terms of the mortgage deed and it provided for the satisfaction of one of the conditions of the deed, evidence was admissible under proviso (2) of Section 92.[94]

Oral evidence to prove that pronote is by way of security is not admissible.[1]

32. EXISTING ORAL AGREEMENT, PROVABLE [PROVISO (3)]

Under this proviso a contemporaneous oral agreement to the effect that a written contract was to be of no force or effect and that it was to impose no obligation at all until the happening of a certain event, may be proved. In a sale of property, payment of consideration was a condition precedent. Failure of consideration was allowed to be proved by independent evidence.[2] See ills. (i) and (j).

Oral evidence to prove some other terms which have been agreed to and which constitute a condition precedent to the obligation under the written agreements and not inconsistent with written agreement, is admissible.

TAYLOR on Evidence (10th Ed., Section 1135, P. 814-15) observed "The rule against the admissibility of parol evidence contained in the section does not exclude evidence of oral agreement, which amounts to a condition subject to which the written agreement had been entered into, and subject to which the performance of the written agreement is to depend, e.g., that a bill or mortgage was only to stand as security for certain moneys or otherwise to show the real nature of the transaction. Thus, it may be shown by parol evidence that an instrument, apparently executed as a deed, had really been delivered simply as an escrow, or it may also be shown that the document was really meant to be conditional on the happening of an event which had never occured".

The distinction in point of law is that evidence to vary the terms of an agreement in writing is not admissible, but evidence to show that there is not an agreement at all is admissible. There is no rule of law to estop parties from showing that a paper purporting to be a signed agreement, was in fact signed by mistake, or that it was signed on the terms that it should not be an agreement till money was paid or something else was done[3] or that is was intended to be a sham and not operative.[4]

GARTH C.J., observed "The proviso is intended to introduce into the law of evidence of this country the rule which is well-established and understood in England and treated in Section 1038 (11th Ed, Section 1135) of MR. TAYLOR'S book on Evidence. That rule is that, when at the time of a written contract being entered into, it is orally agreed between the parties that the written agreement shall not be of any force or validity until some condition precedent has been performed, parol evidence of such oral agreement is admissible to show that the condition has not been performed and consequently the written contract has not become binding. Until the condition is performed, there is, in fact, no written agreement at all.....But this rule can never apply to a case where the written agreement had not only become binding, but had actually been performed as to a large portion of its obligation".[5]

The true meaning of the words "any obligation" is any obligation whatever under the contract, and not some particular obligation which the contract may contain.[6]

Where, at the time of the execution of a written contract, it is orally agreed between the parties that the written agreement shall not be of any force or validity until some condition precedent has been performed, parol evidence of such oral agreement is admissible to show that the condition has not been performed, and consequently, the written agreement has not become binding. This rule will not apply to a case where the written agreement had not only become binding, but had actually been performed as to a large portion of its obligations.[7]

In Rowland Ady & Others v. Administrator General of Burma[8], the Privy Council observed that the accompanying or collateral agreement which was the condition of the execution of the promissory note was a written agreement and therefore outside Section 92. Even if the collateral agreement was an oral agreement so as to come within Section 92, it would fall within Proviso (3) of the section which states the Indian Law in terms which are in accord with English Law. They further observed that it is necessary to distinguish a collateral agreement which alters the legal effect of the instrument from an agreement that the instrument should not be an effective instrument until some condition is fulfilled or to put it in another form, it is necessary to distinguish an agreement in defeasance of the contract from an agreement suspending the coming into force of the contract contained in the promissory note. In their Lordships judgment, this collateral agreement came under the latter description and was within the proviso.

The promissory note, by its express terms provided that the amount was payable on demand, that is at once. The obligation under the note attaches immediately. But the agreement not to make a demand until the specified condition is fulfilled has the intention and effect of suspending the coming into force of that obligation, which is the contract contained in the promissory note. Thus the oral agreement constitutes a condition precedent to the attaching of the obligation and is within the terms of the Proviso (3) of Section 92.[9]

In Narandas v. Papammal[10] where a pronote was executed and the parties entered into a collateral oral agreement to the effect that no demand for payment was to be made until certain specified condition was fulfilled, the Supreme Court, following the decision of the Privy Council in Rowland Ady. v. Administrator General of Burma[11] held that though under the pronote by its express terms payable on demand, the obligation to pay attaches immediately, the parol agreement of the parties to suspend the coming into force of the obligation until the specified condition is fulfilled constitutes a condition precedent to the attaching of the obligation and it is open to the plaintiff to adduce evidence of oral agreement under the 3rd proviso.[12]

This proviso presupposes that the contract, grant or disposition of property itself remains intact, but the condition precedent pleaded must in its very nature be extraneous to the contract, grant or disposition itself and as agreed must come into existence before the obligation attaches thereunder.[13]

If the oral agreement pleaded was one stating that the amount was to be adjusted in the making up of partnership accounts, it was held that proviso (3) was not applicable as the oral agreement had the effect of total denial of the legal liability under the pronote.[14]

Evidence of oral contract regarding the debt embodied in a promissory note was allowed. The note was taken as a collateral security for the debt.[15]

33. CONDITION PRECEDENT

Where there is a sale-deed by A in favour of B an oral agreement, that the sale was to be effective only in case A dies of illness without paying the expenses incurred by B, can be admissible.[16] Evidence of a contemporaneous oral agreement to suspend the operation of a written contract of sale until an agreement for re-sale is executed is admissible.[17] An oral agreement that the execution of a deed of reconveyance should be a condition precedent to the execution of the sale-deed in pursuance of the written contract to sell immovable property can be proved under this proviso.[18] Where the contract was to sell property for Rs. 30,000 which sum was erroenously stated to have been paid, it was competent for the vendor, without infringing any provision of the Act, to prove a collateral agreement that the purchase-money should remain in the vendee's hands for the purposes and subject to the conditions alleged by the vendor[19]; because the section does not say that no statement of fact in a written instrument may be contradicted by oral evidence but the terms of the contract may not be varied, etc. Separate oral agreement to the effect that the contract was subject to the condition that the vendor was to persuade the lessee in possession to surrender his possession within the time specified for the sale, is a condition precedent to the arising of obligations under the contract for sale and has not the effect of varying or contradicting the terms of the contract. Evidence of that agreement which falls within the proviso (3) to Section 92 can be given, since its effect is to prove the nature of the contract, viz, that it is a contingent contract.[20] Where the defendant challenged the surrender deed executed by her on the ground of playing fraud by giving empty promises that she would be paid Rs. 300/- and half of the lands would be settled on her grandchildren, it was held that it would fall under provisos (1) and (3) of Section 92 and extrinsic evidence is admissible for proving fraud.[21]

Oral agreement set up in defence that if sale deed was not presented for registration on the same day on which it was written and if consideration was not paid before the Sub-Registrar, sale deed should be regarded as cancelled, null and void. It was held that such agreement does not fall under any of the provisos of Section 92 and could not be allowed to be proved. It is submitted that the decision is not correct.[22]

In respect of written agreement which has come into force forthwith and has been partly acted upon, there can be no condition precedent and therefore oral evidence against the terms of contract cannot be adduced.[23]

34. DECREE

The understanding between the parties was to the effect that the compromise, filed in the suit according to the terms embodied in the decree itself, would have force or effect only on conditions that all other civil and criminal litigations were withdrawn. Withdrawal of other cases was manifestly a condition precedent to the attaching of any obligation under the contract of the compromise and the case falls within the language of provisos (1) & (3) to Section 92 Evidence Act.[24]

35. ESCROW

An escrow is a document deposited with the third person to be delivered to the person purporting to be benefitted by it upon the performance of some condition, the fulfilment of which is only to bring the contract into existence. Oral evidence is admissible under proviso to Section 92 to show that the deed was executed or delivered conditionally as an escrow. Escrow has also been explained as an intended deed after sealing and any signature required for execution as a deed, to be delivered as an escrow, that is as a simple writing which is not to become the deed to the party expressed to be bound by it until some condition has been performed. Escrow has also been defined to mean that where an instrument is delivered to take effect on the happening of a specified event or upon condition that it is not to be operative until some condition is performed then pending the happening of that event or the performance of the condition, the instrument is called an escrow.[25]

36. EXISTING ANY DISTINCT SUBSEQUENT ORAL AGREEMENT [PROVISO (4)]

This proviso is based on the principle—"Nothing is so agreeable to natural equity as that a thing be unbound in the manner in which it was bound." Under this proviso a prior written contract may be varied by a subsequent verbal one, in cases in which the law does not require the contract to be in writing. Where the original contract is of such a nature as that the law requires it to be in writing or where its execution has been followed by the formality of registration, the only way of proving the rescission or modification of the original contract must be by proof of an agreement of the like formality and not by an oral agreement.

Only those agreements come within the proviso which affect the terms of the previous transaction directly by virtue of the consensus of those who alone are competent to rescind or modify the original contract, viz., all the parties concerned or all their representatives[26]

TAYLOR'S EVIDENCE (10th Ed., Section 1142, p. 820) observed: "After an agreement has been reduced to writing, it is competent to the parties, at any time before breach of it, by a new contract not in writing, either altogether to waive, dissolve, or annul the former agreement, or in any manner to add to, or substract from, or vary or qualify the terms of it, and thus to make a new contract, which is to be proved, partly by the written agreement, and partly by the subsequent verbal terms, engrafted upon what will thus be left of the written agreement. The rule against varying or contradicting a written instrument by parol evidence, does not exclude verbal evidence adduced to prove, that the written agreement has been totally waived or discharged".

Where a later registered deed did not mention the consideration for the sale which was however mentioned in the earlier unregistered transfer deed of the same property and the later registered deed was intended to supersede the earlier unregistered deed, it was held relying on 1969 SC 136 that the earlier deed is not admissible as the terms of a registered deed cannot be varied by an unregistered deed.[27]

It was held that, it was open to the appellants to lead evidence to show that there was, apart from the rent note, a distinct subsequent oral agreement under which the terms of the oral contract or grant was modified and that the partners of the firm, both before and after its recomposition were the real tenants of the shop.[28]

Where there was a lease, the lessor can recover enhanced rent on the basis of a subsequent oral agreement. Oral evidence is permissible of the subsequent oral agreement, as the original lease was neither by law required, to be in writing nor to be registered.[29]

This proviso does not exclude evidence of a subsequent oral agreement substituting a new contract for one reduced to writing and registered according to law, the said proviso only refers to a subsequent oral agreement to rescind or modify such contract.[30] The distinction between a substituted new agreement by novation and the mere alteration of an old contract is that in the former case the old contract is extinguished, while in the latter it remains binding subject to the alteration which the parties have agreed to.[31] According to the Rangoon, the Lahore and the Bombay High Courts a judgment-debtor can set up a new verbal agreement with the decree-holder to accept some variation or a new contract in substituting of the original decree[32] but not according to the Allahabad High Court.[33]

Where the terms of the registered document were ambiguous, oral evidence could be permitted to be adduced in order to determine the true intention of the parties.[34]

37. MORTGAGE

An oral agreement, subsequent to the registered mortgage deed, entered into to take less amount than due under the mortgage deed was held inadmissible as the oral agreement modified the terms of the written deed.[35] No unregistered agreement varying terms of the mortgage could be recognised.[36]

Subsequent oral agreement allowing usufructuary mortgagee to remain in possession for a further period in lieu of interest on debt incurred subsequent to mortgage is not administrable.[37] In a suit for redemption, the mortgagees pleaded that the mortgaged property was subsequently sold to them verbally for the mortgage debt and a further loan. It was held that the mortgage being by a registered deed, evidence of a subsequent oral agreement of sale was inadmissible under this proviso.[38] The Bombay and the Lahore High Courts have held that a subsequent agreement to take less than is due under a registered mortgage-bond is an agreement modifying the terms of a written contract and oral evidence is inadmissible in proof of it[39]. In another suit for redemption of mortgage, the mortgagee contended that the document in question was not a mortgage but a lease. It was held that nomenclature of a document was not conclusive and oral evidence as regards the intention of the parties was not barred by virtue of Section 92.[40] The Calcutta and the Madras High Courts have held that oral evidence is admissible to prove the discharge and satisfaction of a mortgage bond[41]. The Bombay High Court has subsequently held that where all that the defendant wants to prove, is some fact tending to show that the obligation has been discharged, either by payment, or by remission of anything that was due, such fact may be proved as not amounting to a modification of the conditions of the mortgage but relating mainly to the discharge of the contract, and not involving any question of its terms.[42] A Full Bench of the Allahabad High Court has held that an agreement between parties to a mortgage deed cannot be proved by oral evidence to show that on payment of a sum of money less than what would be due on calculating the correct amount of principal and interest at the stipulated rate entered in the mortgage deed the debt would be discharged. Such evidence would be admissible to prove the satisfaction of the debt, as resulting from a mutual agreement by which the mortgagee accepted, in full discharge of the obligation, payment of a part of the sum due and remitted the balance. A plea of such agreement and satisfaction is not one setting up an agreement contradicting, varying, adding to or subtracting from the terms of the contract of mortgage and does not contravene the provisions of this section[43]. A debtor cannot prove that his creditor agreed verbally to take less, but he can prove that the creditor actually did accept less in full satisfaction.

Where the agreement was that the mortgagee is to enjoy the proifts by keeping possession of one of the items of mortgaged property for 5 years, in full satisfaction of the mortgage debt, it was held that such agreement can be proved because it was in fulfilment of the obligation under the mortgage and not in any way altering the terms of the deed.[44] The fact that the mortgagee actually came into possession of the mortgaged property, after the execution of the mortgage deed, can be proved by evidence as it would not come under proviso (4) and as such evidence is not to vary add or contradict the terms of the mortgage deed.[45]

Any variation of rent reserved by a registered lease deed must be made by another registered instrument. The agreement between the landlord and the tenant by which the rent was increased being in variation of a written contract evidence of it was barred under Section 92.[46] A lease contained a covenant for renewal of the lease whereby if the lessee desired to renew the lease he should give three months' notice in writing of his intention to do so. The lessee, however, failed to observe this covenant and relied on an oral agreement between himself and his lessors for renewal of the lease. It was held that evidence of such oral agreement was not admissible.[47] Oral evidence was similarly not allowed to shown that another person than the one mentioned in the deed was intended to be lessee.[48] Though no writing is ordinarily necessary for surrendering a tenancy, if the original lease is registered, the surrender of a portion of the tenancy with an abatement of rent can only be effected by a registered instrument as in such a case surrender involves a variation of the original contract of tenancy. Oral evidence as regards such surrender is inadmissible under Section 92 of the Evidence Act.[49] A stipulation in a registered lease deed about payment of certain amount of rent is a term of the contract and no oral evidence is admissible to contradict or vary the rent when the lease is intended to be an operative transaction, except under another registered document.[50]

Where the registered sale deed was for the land and the super structure thereon and the vendee under contemporaneous unregistered agreement agreed to pay compensation in case he failed to build hospital on land sold, it was held that unregistered agreement cannot be enforced and agreement is not admissible.[51] Where a sale deed is registered and on the date it was executed money was paid by the purchaser and was received by the seller and it was the intention of the parties that it should be an effective transaction, a subsequent unregistered document concelling the sale cannot prevail over the sale deed.[52] An agreement to convey, though reduced to writing, need not be registered under the Indian Registration Act. The agreement can therefore be validly modified by an oral agreement entered into between the parties[53] but where the vendor accepted the fact of the execution of the sale-deed and the case was not that any fraud was played by the vendee but the vendor only named it a sham transaction, oral evidence could not be permitted to be considered to vary the terms of the deed which had been recorded in writing.[54] A lessor can never enhance rent on the basis of a subsequent agreement when the original lease is either required by law to be in writing or to be registered.[55]

Where the plaintiff specifically pleaded that the transaction evidenced by the sale-deed in question was nominal, that it was executed by way of security of the amount borrowed by the plaintiff from the defendant and the defendant was to reconvey the suit plot to him on return of the money with interest, it was held that the plaintiff was entitled to lead oral evidence to prove that the document was sham and not to be acted upon by the parties.[56]

Sections 92 and 115, Evidence Act must be read together. When the alleged oral representation made by a party is not provable under Section 92, Section 115 cannot be invoked to support oral representation. Hence oral consent by landlord is not enough to validate sub-tenancy under Section 16(3), Rent Act and Section 115 will not help to prove sub-tenancy.[57]

deed could not be put in evidence by virtue of proviso (4) to Section 92.[58] Registration of a contract, whether compulsorily registrable or not, is a complete bar to acceptance of oral evidence in proof of modification thereof.[59] A contract reduced to writing and registered, either voluntarily or as required by law, can be modified or rescinded only by a registered instrument and no evidence of subsequent oral agreement to modify or rescind the contract is permissible.[60]

The intention of the legislature in enacting proviso (4) to Section 92 appears to be that registration of a document should imply and carry with it a certain solemnity and that when parties enter into the formality of registration even though the formality may not be obligatory, they should be confined to the terms and conditions of their agreement. The view that it is only when a document is compulsorily registrable that proviso (4) can come into operation is erroneous in view of the wording of this proviso.[61]

41. SETTLEMENT DEED

Where the settlement deed executed by the father was required to be written and was in writing, parol evidence to substantiate any subsequent arrangement, having the effect of modifying the earlier written deed, could not be permitted.[62]

42. WHERE, SUCH CONTRACT, GRANT OR DISPOSITION OF PROPERTY IS BY LAW REQUIRED TO BE IN WRITING OR HAS BEEN REGISTERED [EXCEPTION]

Where there is a registered sale, and a subsequent unregistered agreement stating that the vendee or his heirs will not alienate or dissipate or fritter away the land, it was held that no proof of the unregistered agreement is admissible under Section 92 and the sale can not be revoked and the bar of estoppel or waiver would not operate against the vendee.[63]

43. ANY CUSTOM OR USAGE PROVABLE [PROVISO (5)]

"This proviso is based on the following Maxims:

(i) Consuetudo loci est observanda (i.e.) the custom of the place is to be observed.

(ii) Magister rerum uses (i.e.) use is the master of things (i.e.) usage is a principal guide in practice.

(iii) Optimus interpres rerum usus (i.e.) usage is the best interpreter of things.[64]

"The reception of evidence of usage is often not only justifiable in principle, but absolutely necessary; and without it, the intention of the parties would be often defeated.....The rule, for admitting evidence of usage must be taken always with this qualification that the evidence proposed is not repugnant to or inconsistent with the written contract. It sought never to be allowed to vary or contradict the written instrument either expressly or by implication"..... "where the incident sought to be annexed to a contract is of such a nature" that the parties are not themselves competent to introduce it by express stipulation, such an incident cannot be annexed by the tacit stipulation arising from usage."[65]

Parol evidence of usage or custom is admissible in aid of the construction of a written instrument. Such evidence is received for explaining or filling up terms used in commercial contracts, policies of insurance, negotiable instruments, and other writings of a similar kind,—when the language, though well-understood by the parties, and by all who have to act upon it in matters of business, would often appear to the common reader scarcely intelligible, and sometimes almost a foreign language. The terms used in these instruments are to be interpreted according to the recognised practice and usage with reference to which the parties are supposed to have acted; and the sense of the words, so interpreted, may be taken to be the appropriate and true sense intended by the parties.[66]

"When the words of a document are used in relation to places or people where, or amongst whom, established usages prevail, proof of such usages may be given to construe the document, although the words themselves are unambiguous[67] and where particular terms have a double meaning, the one common and the other local or peculiar, similar evidence may be given to explain such terms, although their ordinary meaning might also apply. Evidence of usage, however, cannot be given to vary the statutory meaning of words[68] nor where it is expressly excluded by, or is inconsistent with, the terms of the document; nor where there is nothing in the context or surrounding circumstances pointing to a peculiar use of the words.[69] .....Such usages, when not judicially noticed, are provable by witnesses; but they raise an inference for the jury merely, and not a conclusion of law that the parties used the words in the conventional sense."[70]

A trade usage is a usage so general and well known and properly understood in fact with reference to the business that the parties are presumed to have their contract with tacit reference to it and to have intended to be governed by it the same way and to the same extent as other like persons in like cases.[71]

The Supreme Court in Mahindra and Mahindra v. Union of India[72] held "It is true that a clause in an agreement may embody a trade practice and such a trade practice may have the actual or probable effect of restricting or destroying competition and hence they constitute a restrictive trade practice. To know the effect of such clause oral evidence can be adduced "to determine whether a particular trade practice set out in the agreement has or may have the effect of preventing, distorting or restricting competitions so as to constitute "a restrictive trade practice" under the Monoplies and Restrictive Trade Practice Act 1969 and that Sections 91 and 92 are no bar as it would not amount to contradicting varying, adding to, or substracting from the terms of the document." The Supreme Court held that the decision in Hindustan Liver Ltd., Bombay v. Monopolies and Restrictive Trade Practices Commission[73] is not good law.

Where there is a custom and practice in trade, of supplying free meals to passengers in air travel, it was held that it is not repugnant to or inconsistent with the printed terms and the custom and practice is admissible in evidence.[74]

Recently it was decided by a consumer forum that supply of dinner to Railway passengers included supply of drinking water also.

In respect of sale of liquid molasses, by "F.O.R." or "Ready Delivery" contracts, evidence is admissible to prove usage as to who should procure tank wagons at the siding for pumping the liquid.[75]

Interest, though not expressly stipulated in a written contract, may be claimed on the ground of usage.[76]

Mercantile usage need not be ancient. It is sufficient if it is so well known and acquiesced in that it may be reasonably presumed to have been an ingrediant tacitly included in the contract.[77]

In K.M.P.R.N.M. Firm v. Somasundara[78]; it was held that according to custom, piece-goods merchants in godown street Madras in respect of sales, known as "Thavanni" charge 3/4% per month after 60 days. It was held that if the custom pleaded is well known locally and to the parties to it, it may be presumed to have been an ingredient tacitly imported by the parties into the contract.

In the case of custom or usage it is permissible to import into contract such custom even though a party to the contract was not actually aware of the custom or usage. But in the case of a practice, it must be shown that it was known to the person whom it is sought to bind and that he tacitly agreed to its being a term of the contract.[79]

44. ANNEXING OF SUCH INCIDENT IS NOT REPUGNANT OR INCONSISTENT WITH THE EXPRESS TERMS OF THE CONTRACT

But the rule for admitting evidence of usage must be taken always with this qualification, that the evidence proposed is not repugnant to, or inconsistent with, the written contract. It ought never to be allowed to vary or contradict the written instrument, either expressly or by implication... where the incident sought to be annexed to a contract is unreasonable or illegal, it cannot be annexed to the contract by evidence of usage".[80]

Evidence of custom in respect of tenancies is inadmissible where the custom alleged is contrary to the terms of the written contract. Where there is an express term in the kabuliat, that the tenant had no right of sale, gift or transfer in any manner, no evidence of custom on the question of transferability and heritability, is admissible.[81]

The inconsistancy may be evinced by the express terms of the written instrument or by implication therefrom.[82] Oral evidence of a custom that when the due date of performance of a contract falls on a holiday, the contract may be performed on the next working day, is admissible.[83]

45. ANY FACT SHOWING HOW THE LANGUAGE OF A DOCUMENT IS RELATED TO EXISTING FACTS [PROVISO (6)]

The proviso is a substantive provision laying down the law relating to the admissibility of extrinsic evidence as an aid to the construction of a document in cases in which it is necessary to find out how the document is related to the existing facts.[84]

The Bombay High Court observed "that is one of the provisos which is the despair of the Judge and the joy of the lawyers. Where a document itself is a perfectly plain, straight forward document, no extrinsic evidence is required to show in what manner the language of the document is related to existing facts. There may be cases where such extrinsic evidence is required, and it will therefore be admitted. But it can only be in such cases where the terms of the documents themselves require explanation, evidence can be led within the restrictions laid down by proviso".[85]

Proviso (6) to Section 92 is not an exception to the rule laid down in the main part of the section. it is a substantive provision itself laying down the law relating to the admissibility of extrinsic evidence as an aid to the construction of a document in cases in which it is necessary to find out how the document is related to existing facts. Proviso (6) to Section 92 does not take away or qualify anything that would, but for that proviso, have fallen within the substantive portion of that section unlike the main portion of Section 92. Proviso (6) is not restricted to extrinsic evidence of an oral agreement or statement.[86]

Under Section 92, proviso (6) extrinsic evidence is admissible for the purpose of showing the circumstances in which the document came to be prepared and executed with a view to arrive at the true effect of the transaction to which the document relates.[87]

Where meaning is doubtful, the surrounding circumstances can be looked into as to the creation of the document and subject matter to which it was designed and intended to apply.[88]

Oral evidence regarding the intention of the parties is only excluded. But the surrounding circumstances and conduct of parties can be shown in what manner the language was used relating to the existing facts and to arrive at the true meaning of the document.[89]

For considering whether a specification of a prior invention describes the invention claimed by the subsequent inventor is a question of construction and parol evidence is only admissible for the purpose of explaining words or symbols of art and other alike technical matters, and of informing the court of relevant surrounding circumstances.[90]

46. INTENTION OF PARTIES

Extrinsic evidence to determine the effect of an instrument is permissible where there remains a doubt as to its true meaning. Evidence of the acts done under it is a guide to the intention of the parties in such a case and particularly when acts are done shortly after the date of the instrument.[91] Objection that the proceedings for possession by the landlord after the expiry of the tenancy period were camouflage and the real intention was to create a general tenancy, could not be raised after the expiry of the period of tenancy.[92] The rule of construction in this proviso enables the Court to examine the facts and surrounding circumstances to which the language of the document may be related and is applicable when the words of the document taken by themselves are not so clear in their meaning and the Court cannot understand the true intent of an indenture, but only by the words of indenture.[93]

47. ACTS AND CONDUCT OF PARTIES

In the case of an ambiguous instrument, there is no reason why subsequent interpreting statement should be inadmissible. Extrinsic evidence to determine the effect of an instrument is permissible where there remains a doubt as to its true meaning and evidence of the acts done under it is a guide to the intention of the parties particularly, when acts are done shortly after the date of the instrument. When the terms of the document are ambiguous, the right of the parties may be determined by a reference to the subsequent statements or conduct of the parties.[94]

Where the question was whether some properties attached in execution, were included in the trust deed, it was held that the ambiguity was latent and proviso (6) was applicable to know the conduct of the parties in construing the expression used in the deed.[95]

48. IS RELATED TO

Where there was a misdescription of the officer who authorised to file a complaint, it was held that extraneous evidence was admissible under Section 95 and proviso (6) to Section 92, Evidence Act, to understand in which sense the language used in the complaint had been used. The language used in the complaint was plain in itself, but was unmeaning in reference to existing facts, there being no Municipal Board which was replaced by Nagar Maha Palika Board many months before. Evidence could, therefore, be admitted to understand in which sense the unmeaning words had been used, and extraneous evidence is admissible to prove that the complaint was made by a duly authorised person.[1]

If the recitals in the document are indecisive and ambiguous, then only the courts will take into consideration surrounding circumstances and the conduct of parties in deciding the passing of title.[2]

It is always open to show how the terms of a document are related to existing state of things, it is therefore always open to prove that the terms of a particular document are those given to a sub-contractor though the word sub-contractor has not been used in the document. Oral evidence is such cases is not excluded.[3]

Where the language of a surety bond though plain in itself, is unmeaning with reference to the existing facts and circumstances, extraneous evidence is admissible to show the actual intention of the parties thereto and as to contingencies contemplated by them while executing the bond.[4]

In a Fire Insurance Policy-Description of building contained in policy was vague and not exhaustive, oral evidence by agent explaining intention of parties while filling proposal form neither contradicting, varying, adding to or substracting from terms of policy is not excluded by Section 92.[5]

The ruler of erstwhile Chamba State had by a deed, made an inam grant of certain land along with Namasi in favour of G and her son D. During regular settlement operation, the cultivable land granted under the deed was mutated in the ownership of D, but Namasi was not mutated in his name and it was recorded as owned by the State Government. And only the name of the forest was specified. Where the deed contained the words 'along with Namasi' after the description of the cultivable lands, those words indicated that besides cultivable land. Namasi was also granted. Though the word 'namasi' was vague and did not by itself lead to the inference that any area, in Namasidhar forest, was granted but that ambiguity about 'namasi' was a latent one and extrinsic evidence was admissible, under proviso (6) of Section 92, for resolving the ambiguity and for showing that the word Namasi related to some existing state of things.[6]

When the words of a written instrument are free from ambiguity and where external circumstances do not create any doubt or difficulty as to the proper application of the words, such instrument is always to be construed according to the strict plain common meaning of the words themselves and evidence de hors the instrument for the purpose of explaining it according to the surmises or alleged intention of the parties to the instrument is utterly inadmissible. The cases in which parol evidence when objected to is, apart from fraud or mistake, receivable to correct written instruments are cases, where, for example, the evidence supplements, but does not contradict, the terms of the deed; where the provisions of the deed leave the question doubtful whether merely a mortgage and not an out-and-out sale was intended or where the language sought to be explained in evidence is language in an ordinary conveyancing form not exhaustively accurate but without an actual misstatement of fact.[7]

While construing a written contract, the court will be erring in approaching the question of what formed the subject matter of the negotiations which preceeded the written contract between the parties, without first settling to what extent the contract was so ambiguous as to justify resort to evidence as to the negotiations. It was held that there was no ambiguity as to the meaning of the words 'works of a similar nature'. They clearly referred to work 'for the excavation of stone and construction thereof by means of machineries'. Such works being similar to the works which were the subject of the negotiations and there was no justification for excluding such works on the ground that the means of carrying out the works, though it was machinery, was machinery which was not discussed during the negotiations. Therefore, resort to oral evidence was not justified.[8]

49. THE EXISTING FACTS

It is well settled that no evidence is admissible on a question of construction of a contract or grant, which must be based solely on the terms of the document which are clear and where there is no dispute as to how the contents of the document are related to existing facts.[9] When the terms of a document are clear, conduct of parties as to how they understood them is not admissible, as it is irrelevant.[10] Generally speaking, evidence of surrounding circumstance is admissible only where there is some ambiguity or doubt as to the meaning of the terms of documents. Under this proviso, the terms of an unambiguous document cannot be controlled by the conduct of the parties.[11] In construing a written instrument the plain meaning of the express words are to be adhered to irrespective of the question of the intention of the parties.[12]

50. IN WHAT MANNER THE LANGUAGE OF A DOCUMENT

Where the operative part of the document is clear and free from ambiguity no oral evidence is admissible in ascertaining the intention of the parties. If the question is not what the parties may have intended but what is the meaning of the words which they have used, oral evidence is permissible.[13]

Section 92 of the Evidence Act forbids the admission or consideration of evidence to prove the intentions of the party and the nature of the transaction will have to be decided "on a consideration of the contents of the documents themselves with such extrinsic evidence of the surrounding circumstances as may be required to show in what manner the language of the document is related to existing facts".[14]

Sections 94 and 95, Evidence Act, define the sphere of operation of proviso (6) to Section 92 and it is manifest from these two sections that it is only in cases where the terms of the document leave the question in doubt, that resort can be had to proviso (6) to Section 92, Evidence Act. It cannot be postulated that the legislature intended to nullify, the object of Section 92 by enacting exceptions to that section. Exceptions or proviso to the section are not meant to render the section itself nugatory, when there is a latent ambiguity in a document and not when the language is plain with reference to existing facts, Section 92(6) would come into play.[15]

Intention of parties has to be determined from document itself and not from surrounding circumstances. Inadequacy of price or payment of cost of stamp by executant cannot alter its nature.[16]

The nature of a document is to be ascertained on a conspectus of the whole of it. It is not possible to gather the intention of the parties to a document by ignoring a part of it. The deposition of any party to a document at the trial is not at all relevant for the purpose of ascertaining the intention at the time of the execution of document. The intention is to be gathered 'from the language used when it is clear and unequivocal.[17]

When the terms of an ancient grant are unambiguous, it is not open to the court to say that the document means something else than what it clearly says, merely because the parties have gone on for a long time so understanding it. In a case of ambiguity, however, the court can uphold, the construction of deed which justifies a long usage; but where there is no ambiguity, the court will not accept an erroneous interpretation though consistent with usage, so as to sanction a manifest breach of trust.[18]

51. SALE AND MORTGAGE

Where the question is whether the sale deed can be treated as a mortgage by reason of incorporation of a condition for repurchase the property, the intention of the parties is to be gathered from the language of the deed in the light of surrounding circumstances. If the language is ambiguous, intention can be gathered from the contents of the deed with such extrinsic evidence permissible u/proviso (6) of Section 92. Oral evidence of intention though not admissible, can be permitted to explain or even to contradict the recitals as distinguished from the terms of the document. Evidence of contemporaneous conduct is always admissible as a surrounding circumstance. But evidence of subsequent conduct of the parties is inadmissible.[19]

It is not permissible to consider the surrounding circumstances with a view to holding that a document which on the face of it is a sale deed is intended to operate as mortgage. There must be some limit to the suggestion that the surrounding circumstances can always be scrutinized so as to enable the court to alter or change the nature of a document to something different from what it purports to be. Otherwise, there can be no certainity as to the proper construction to be placed on a document which to all appearances is unambiguous.[20]

Extrinsic evidence is admissible for purpose of showing that a document, which purports to be, and, on the face of it, a deed of sale, is in reality a deed of gift.[21]

Where the terms in the bond clearly indicate that the transaction was that of a usufructuary mortgage and not an absolute sale, oral evidence of subsequent events would not be admissible to prove the contrary, and proviso (6) would not apply.[22] In a sale deed the value of the land is found to be far more than the consideration mentioned therein, the vendee does not take possession and allows the vendor to remain in possession, and the vendor continues to pay the revenue and this state of affairs continues for a long time, evidence of these existing facts and the manner in which the language was adopted in the document in respect thereto will certainly have to be allowed. All these facts will really act as an estoppel on the vendee from claiming that the sale deed really conveyed title to him and was nor a mortgage.[23] It was held, that the court was right in applying proviso (6) to Section 92 read with Sections 94 and 95 of the Evidence Act in allowing the existing facts to be proved by the plaintiff in order to show that the suit document was really only a mortgage and not sale deed.[24]

52. LEASE

The proposition of law is well-settled that if the recitals in the lease itself and the terms thereof make out non-agricultural purposes and are free from all ambiguity, the only guide for determination of the nature of the lease would be the lease deed itself. But if the terms are not decisive and free from ambiguity, extraneous evidence will be admissible for the purpose of determining the nature of the lease.[25]

When there was oral and documentary evidence, not proving the tenancy chit executed, it could be challenged under Section 92(6) of the Evidence Act.[26]

53. WILLS

Plain and natural meaning to the words used in the wills, has to be given.[27]

When two wills were executed on two different dates and when there is ambiguity of language in the later will as to whether it was in substitution of or in addition to the earlier will, extrinsic evidence can be admitted to clear up that ambiguity and to certain testator's intention.[28]

54. CONSTRUCTION OF WILLS

In Soorjeemoney v. Denobudhoo[29] it was observed: "The Hindu Law, no less than the English Law points to the intention as the element by which we are to be guided in determining the effect of a testamentary disposition; nor, so far as we are aware, is there any difference between the one law and the other, as to the materials from which the intention is to be collected. Primarily, the words of the will are to be considered. They convey the expression of the testator's wishes; but the meaning to be attached to them may be affected by surrounding circumstances, and where this is the case, those circumstances, no doubt, must be regarded. Among the circumstances thus to be regarded, is the law of the country under which the will is made, and its dispositions are to be carried out. If that law has attached to particular words a particular meaning, or to a particular disposition a particular effect, it must be assumed that the testator, in the dispositions which he has made, had regard to that meaning or to the effect, unless the language of the will or the surrounding circumstances displace that assumption."[30]

The circumstances prevailing at the time of execution of the will can be taken in deciding the question as to the daughter's claim to an absolute estate.[31]

It is not improper to take into consideration the ordinary notions and wishes of a Hindu in respect of devolution of property.[32]

The court should put itself into the testator's arm chair and give effect to the intention by taking into consideration the surrounding circumstances the language used, his outlook and manners etc., factors.[33] All parts of a will are to be construed as a whole, and should try to reconcile one with the other, if there is any conflict, and if it is not possible to reconcile, the latter part would prevail over the earlier part. That should be done after taking all the surrounding circumstances to ascertain the intention of the testator.[34] Court has no power to give effect to a hypothetical intention by supplying lacunae in the will, and thereby making practically a new will for the testator.[35]

This section makes evidence as to the intention of a document contrary to its express language inadmissible; but its proviso (6) lets in evidence to show in what manner the disputed transaction or the language of the document was related to existing facts.[36]

Sections 93-97 partly develop and partly restrict the principle laid down by this proviso.

Exclusion of evidence to explain or amend ambiguous document.

S. 93. When the language used in a document is, on its face, ambiguous or defective, evidence may not be given of facts which would show its meaning or supply its defects.

COMMENTS

1. PRINCIPLE AND SCOPE

Sections 93 to 98 deal with rules for construction of documents with the aid of extrinsic evidence. Sections 91 and 92 define the cases in which documents are exclusive evidence of the transactions which they embody. Sections 93-99 deal with the interpretation of documents by oral evidence.

Where the language employed in a document is ambiguous, the question of admissibility or otherwise of extraneous evidence is regulated by the provisions contained in Section 93 and Sections 95 to 98.[37]

Under this section no evidence is admissible to show the meaning or to supply the defects in a document when the language used is, on its face, ambiguous or defective.

There are two sorts of ambiguities of words-the one is ambiguitas patens and other latens. Patens is that which appears to be ambiguous upon the deed or instrument; latens is that which seems certain and without ambiguity, for anything that appears upon the deed or instrument; but there is some collateral matter out of the deed that breeds the ambiguity.[38] A good test of the difference is to put the instrument into the hands of an ordinary intelligent educated person. If, on perusal, he sees no ambiguity, but there is nevertheless an uncertainty as to its application, the ambiguity is latent; if he detects the ambiguity from merely reading the instrument it is patent. Thus, in illustration (b), the blanks would be patent ambiguities and they could not be filled in by parol testimony as to the intention of the parties, etc. In the illustration to S. 95 no one could detect any ambiguity from merely reading the instrument. The ambiguity does not consist in the language, but is introduced by extrinsic circumstances.[39]

This section deals with patent ambiguities. If the language of a deed is, on its face, ambiguous or defective, no evidence can be given to make it certain.[40]

STEPHEN in his digest (Art 91) states, "If the words of a document are so defective or ambiguous as to be unmeaning, no evidence can be given to show what the author of the document intended to say."

40. Deojit v. Pitambar, (1876) 1 All 275.

NORTON on Evidence (p. 279-280) quotes the following observation of STARKIE which runs: "By patent-ambiguity, 'must' be understood an ambiguity inherent in the words and incapable of being dispelled, either by any legal rules of construction applied to the instrument itself, or by evidence showing that terms, in themselves unmeaning or unintelligible, are capable of receiving a known conventional meaning. The great principle on which the rule is founded is that the intention of parties should be construed, not by vague evidence of their intention, independently of the expressions which they have thought fit to use, but by the expressions themselves. How, those expressions which are incapable of any legal construction and interpretation by the rules of art, are either so because they are in themselves unintelligible, or because being intelligible they exhibit a plain and obvious uncertainty. In the first instance, the case admits of two varieties; the terms though at first sight untelligible, may yet be capable of having a meaning annexed to them by extrinsic evidence just as if they were written in a foreign language, as when mercantile terms are used, which amongst mercantile men have a distinct and definite meaning, although others do not comprehend them; the term used may, on the other hand, be capable of no distinct and definite interpretation. Now it is evident that to give effect to an instrument, the terms of which though apparently ambiguous are capable of having a distinct and definite meaning annexed to them, is no violation of the general principle, for in such a case effect is given, not to any loose conjecture as to the intent and meaning of the party, but to the expressed meaning and that, on the other hand where either the terms used are incapable of any certain and definite meaning, or, being in themselves intelligible, exhibit a plain and obvious uncertainty and are equally capable of different applications, to give an effect to them by extrinsic evidence as to the intention of the party, would be to make the supposed intention operate independently of the definite expression of such intention. By patent ambiguity, therefore, must be understood an inherent ambiguity, which cannot be removed either by the ordinary rule of legal constructions, or by the application of extrinsic and explanatory evidence, showing the expressions prima facie untelligible, are yet capable of conveying a certain and definite meaning."

WIGRAM in his books on Extrinsic Evidence (2nd Ed., p.130) observed, "A written instrument is not ambiguous because an ignorant and uninformed person is unable to interpret it. It is ambiguous only if found to be of uncertain meaning when persons of competent skill and information are unable to do so. Words cannot be ambiguous because they are unintelligible to a man who cannot read, nor can they be ambiguous merely because the Court which is called upon to explain them may be ignorant of a particular fact, art, or science, which was familiar to the person who used the words and a knowledge of which is therefore necessary to a right understanding of the words he has used. If this be not a just conclusion, it must follow that the question, whether a will is ambiguous, might be dependent, not upon the propriety of the language, the testator has used, but upon the degree of knowledge, general or even local, which a particular judge might happen to possess; may, the technical precision and accuracy of a scientific man might occasion his intestacy a proposition too absurd for an argument" ... (WIGRAM-EXTRINSIC Evidence 2nd Edn. p. 130).

WIGRAM further says as to the inaccuracy of expression and ambiguity as follows "A distinction must be taken between inaccuracy and ambiguity of language. Language may be inaccurate without being ambiguous and it may be ambiguous although perfectly accurate. If for instance, a testator, having one leased whole house in a given place, and another house, were to devise his free hold house there to A.B, the description, though inaccurate would occasion no ambiguity. If however, a testator were to devise an estate to JOHN BAKER, of Dale, the son of Thomas, and there were two persons to whom the entire description accurately applied, this description, though accurate would be ambiguous. It is obvious, therefore, that the whole of that class of cases in which an inaccurate description is found to be sufficient, merely by the rejection of words of surplusage are cases in which no ambiguity really exists. The meaning is certain, notwithstanding the inaccuracy of the testators language."

"Latent ambiguities are of two kinds. First where the description of the devisee or the property devised is clear upon the face of the will, but it turns out that there is more than one estate or person to which the description applies; and second where the devise or property devised is imperfectly, or in some respects, erroneously described, so as to leave it doubtful what person or property is meant."[41]

According to Section 100 of this Act, Sections 91 to 99 covered by Chap. VI in this Act shall not affect any of the provisions of the Indian Succession Act (X of 1865) (which was later replaced by the Indian Succession Act 39 of 1925) as to the construction of wills. Sections 74 to 111 of Act 39 of 1925 provide rules of construction of wills. Even in Act 39 of 1925, Section 81 states that where there is ambiguity or deficiency on the face of a will, no extrinsic evidence, as to the intentions of the testator shall be admitted.

When the name of a legatee is left blank, extraneous evidence was held not admissible to show who was intended.[42] When a bequest was made in favour of the son of LNG, no evidence is admissible who was meant.

The Supreme Court observed that Section 93 is clear on the point that if on a fair construction the condition mentioned in the document is held to be vague or uncertain, no evidence would be admitted to remove the vagueness or uncertainity. It is the language of the document alone that will decide the question. It would not be open to the parties to the court to attempt to remove the defect of vagueness or uncertainty by relying upon any extrinsic evidence.[43]

2. GENERAL PRINCIPLES OF INTERPRETATION OF DOCUMENTS

The duty of the court is always interpretation to find out not what really was the intention of the parties, as distinguished from what mere words expressed, but merely to find out the meaning of the words used by them.[44]

LORD ATKIN observed "When the meaning of the words is plain it is not the duty of the courts to busy themselves with supposed intention."[45]

When ordinary or commonly used words are used they should be given their ordinary meaning. In the construction of a deed, the question is not what the parties may have intended, as the intention of the parties is not admissible, but what is the meaning of the words they have used.[46]

The Supreme Court held that in the first place intention must be gathered from the document itself; that if the words are express and clear, effect must be given to them and any extraneous enquiry into what was thought or intended is ruled out.[47]

The general principles may be summarised as follows.—Where the document is plain and unambiguous, one has to read the words in their ordinary and grammatical meaning unless it leads to an absurdity and is repugnant to the intention of the parties as can be gathered from the other parts of the document.[48]

Subsequent conduct of parties would be an irrelevant consideration, where the words are clear or the question is purely one of construction of the deed.[49]

However, it is open to see what preceeded the execution of the document, when the meaning of the words is not clear.[50] When the question of interpretation is involved, it would not be permissible for any court to call upon a witness to explain the language of the document unless the witness is an expert within the meaning of the Evidence Act, as it is the duty of the Court to interpret.[51]

Extrinsic evidence of every material fact which will enable the Court to ascertain the nature and qualities of the subject-matter of the instrument, or, in other words, to identify the person and things to which the instrument refers, is admissible (1). Thus, where there is a written agreement to deliver a quantity of grain at a particular time, parol evidence is admissible under certain limitations to show what kind of grain the contracting parties had in their contemplation at the time the contract was made (2).[52]

Normally extrinsic evidence is not admissible to explain the patent ambiguity because the court is not expected to make instruments but only to interpret them. The Allahabad High Court held that Section

93 does not affect the power of the court to fill in the blanks or omissions by applying the ordinary rules of construction of documents, though extrinsic evidence is not admissible.[53]

Where the question is as to the meaning of the words in a document, evidence is admissible to show in what peculiar sense a particular word was used, and extrinsic evidence including the evidence of subsequent conduct of the parties to determine the intention of the parties and the effect of the document is admissible.[54]

Where Khasra numbers were not given in the sale deed due to inadvertence and later a rectification deed was executed it was held that evidence of the later deed was not extraneous evidence as contemplated by Section 93 and it was admissible.[55]

3. CASES OF PATENT AMBIGUITY

Where a document showed acknowledgement of debt and also the mode of repayment in annual instalments of Rs. 500/- and over, it was held that the mode of payment was void for uncertainty but as that clause was severable from the clause acknowledging the debt, the document is to be considered as a receipt simpliciter without an agreement to pay and no oral evidence can be given under Section 93 as to mode of repayment.[56]

Where a notice was sent purporting to cancel two powers of attorney, one special and one general, and when only "a power of attorney" was referred three times in the notice, but did not refer to any special or general power of attorney, it was held that it could not be deemed to have cancelled any of such powers when the two powers of attorney were different in nature and served two different purposes and under Section 93 evidence can not be given of the facts which would show its meaning or supply its defects.[57]

In the case of an arbitration clause in a contract either the word "Chief Engineer" or the "Additional Chief Engineer" was intended to be retained by striking of one of them. But both of them were retained in the particular clause. It was held that though by inadvertence or neglect, the parties had not struck out any one of the two from the standard clause it was absolutely necessary to give the clause a definite meaning; ambiguity was therefore patent and so void for uncertainty, unless the ambiguity could be cured by election.[58]

4. LATENT AMBIGUITY

In the case of latent ambiguity it was held that the construction put on the document by the parties themselves is the one which may safely be adopted.[59]

5. NO AMBIGUITY

Before Section 93 of this Act could apply, it must be shown that there is patent ambiguity. Section 93 cannot possibly be a bar for showing how a challan filed along with an election petition is to be interpreted, when there is no ambiguity in the challan at all.[60]

Where the terms of a bonus agreement, between the employer and the workers, are free from ambiguity, it was held that the evidence of the employer either to explain or to contradict the terms cannot be allowed.[61]

COMMENTS

1. PRINCIPLE AND SCOPE

This section says that when the language is plain in itself i.e. does not admit any ambiguity and applies to the existing facts, no evidence is permissible to show that it was not meant to apply to such facts. This section does not speak of any patent or latent ambiguity in any document.

LORD HALSBURY observed "The words of a written instrument must be construed according to their natural meaning, and it appears to me that no amount of acting by the parties can alter or qualify words which are plain and unambiguous. So far as I am aware, no principle has ever been more universally or vigorously insisted upon than that written instruments, if they are plain and unambiguous, must be construed according to the plain and unambiguous language of the instrument itself."[62]

The general rule is to give the words their natural meaning unless when applied to the subject-matter they result in an absurdity or such great inconvenience that the court concludes that the words would not have been used in their proper signification.[63]

In re : Gale[64] the testator gave his property to an unmarried woman with whom he was living 'during her widowhood'. Her identity was clear but as she was unmarried she could not be the testatory widow after his death and the expression 'during her widowhood' was unmeaning and hence it was ignored and the bequest upheld.

Where the language in its ordinary sense properly applies to the facts without any difficulty, evidence to show that it bears a different meaning will be rejected, as it contradicts the document.

Section 94 will apply only when the execution of the document is admitted and no vitiating circumstance has been put forward against it. Oral evidence of the witnesses in the proceedings of the Board in a Court Martial case are admissible in evidence.[65]

2. CONSTRUCTION OF BONDS

The Supreme Court in Kamala Devi v. Takhatmal[66] held that Section 94 lays down a rule of interpretation of the language of a document when it is plain and applies accurately to existing facts; it says that evidence may not be given to show that it was not meant to apply to such facts. (Note:—the words "may be given" was used by the Supreme Court though in the section "may not be given" was used; it is obviously a mistake). The Supreme Court observed that when a court is asked to interpret a document, it looks at its language; if the language is clear and unambiguous and applies accurately to existing facts, it shall accept the ordinary meaning; sometimes when it is said that a court shall look into all the circumstances to find an author's intention, it is only for the purpose of finding out whether the words apply accurately to existing facts; but, if the words are clear in the context of the surrounding circumstances, the court cannot rely on them to attribute to the author an intention contrary to the plain meaning of the words used in the document; In construing the terms of a security bond, if the language is plain and applies to the existing facts and in which no ambiguity or inconsistancy of the kind dealt with by Sections 95 to 98 exists, it is not permissible to rely on the surrounding circumstances under which the bond came to be executed.[67]

Under this section evidence to show that common words, whose meaning is plain, not appearing from the context to have been used in a peculiar sense, have been in fact so used, is not admissible.[68]

3. NATURAL MEANING HAS TO BE GIVEN TO THE WORDS

The duty of the court is not to probe in depth to ascertain one's undisclosed intention, but only to take the ordinary and natural meaning of the words used.[69]

If the words in a document are unambiguous and the difficulty is only grammatical, extrinsic evidence is not admissible.[70] Where the document shows that only 5 pies share in the Zamindari was mortgaged, oral evidence is not admissible to prove that the mortgagor intended to mortgage his entire Zamindari, when the deed is clear and unambiguous.[71] Where 'Sir lands' were sold extrinsic evidence cannot be allowed to show that what were intended to be sold were not 'Sir lands' but 'Sir rights.'[72]

In PHIPSON on Evidence (15th Edn. (2000), Paras 43-46, page 1232) it is observed, "In the case of property, where proof has been given of a subject- matter satisfying all the terms of a written description, the maxim non accipi debent verba in demonstrationem falsam quae competunt in limitationem veram applies, and extrinsic evidence cannot be given to show that something more or less extensive was intended.[73]..... This applies not only to descriptions in the deed itself but to those in a map or schedule referred to therein;[74] though it is otherwise where such map is clearly erroneous[75], or on too small a scale to be effective[76] or where, though attached to the deed, it is not referred to therein.[77] A plan attached to a conveyance may rebut the presumption that would otherwise arise from the existence of a hedge and ditch on the boundary.[78] So, with regard to personal property; thus, where there is a specific bequest and proof of property correctly answering the description, evidence is not admissible to extend it to other property.[79]

If a person, known to the testator, accurately fufils the words in a will, evidence cannot be given to show that such person was not intended.[80]

Children means legitimate children and any evidence de hors the instrument itself to show that the settlor must have meant to use ordinary words otherwise than in their usual meaning cannot be allowed.[81]

In England, by the Family Law Reform Act 1969 any reference to the child of any person is construed as or as including a reference to the illegitimate child of that person.

The Privy Council observed that it would not be permissible to allow evidence of subsequent conduct to show that it was not meant to apply to such facts.[82]

Where the language is plain and unambiguous the intention of the parties has to be gathered from the language.[83] itself without taking the aid of surrounding circumstances.

While the true construction of an obscurely framed document may be determined by reference to the conduct of the parties, no such procedure is admissible when the terms of the instrument are unambiguous, for no amount of acting by the parties can alter or qualify words which are plain and unambiguous.[84] If there is no ambiguity in a document, the mere fact that parties have acted on an erroneous construction of an instrument furnishes in itself no reason why the Courts should not follow the general rule that an instrument should be construed according to its natural meaning in the light of the circumstances in which it was executed.[85]

When the original Sanad in regard to an ancient grant was produced and no ambiguity was found, it was held that conduct of parties cannot be looked into in interpreting the Sanad.[86] When a document like a promissory note, having some value and sanctity is in evidence, it outweighs everything else on record. Hence, it is not the calibre of oral evidence but intrinsic evidence of the promissory note that is material.[87]

In a libel case the Privy Council held that the plaintiff's witnesses can not be asked what they would mean by the words used, which were complained of, because it is a question for the court or the jury to decide; the witnesses can only depose that they understood the words as referring to the plaintiff.[88]

4. ADMISSIBILITY OF EXTRINSIC EVIDENCE

Where there were two wills executed on two different dates and the later will was ambiguous on the face of it, as to whether it was in substitution or in addition to the earlier will, it was held that extrinsic evidence can be admitted to ascertain the testator's intentions.[89] Where in a lease agreement payment of interest on arrears of rent was stipulated but not its mode of payment, it was held that the collector was not prevented by Section 94 from deciding the mode and direct writ petition for the purpose was not maintainable.[90]

A vendee filed a suit for declaration that he was the owner of Khasra No. 867 and that by mistake No. 855 was mentioned in the sale deed. In the sale deed it was mentioned that the vendors were in possession of No. 855 and put in possession of the vendees. It was held that Section 94 would not apply because the language in the sale deed did not apply to the existing facts, inasmuch as it was stated in the sale deed that the vendors were in possession of No. 855 and the vendee was put in possession, while as a matter of fact vendors were not in possesson, though they were the owners thereof, of No. 855.[91]

Section 92 proviso (6) states that any fact may be proved which shows in what manner the language of a document is related to the existing facts.

Under Section 94 no evidence can be allowed to show that the language in the document was not meant to apply to facts to which it accurately applies. Thus the difference is clear. The main principle of Section 92 is to see that no evidence should be permitted for the purpose of contradicting, varying, adding to or subtracting from the terms of a contract, grant or other disposition of property or any matter required by law to be reduced to the form of a document. Sections 94 and 95 when read with the main principle laid down in Section 92 clearly suggest that Section 92 proviso (6) comes into play only when there is latent ambiguity in a document.[92]

Evidence as to document in, unmeaning reference to existing facts

S. 95 When language used in a document is plain in itself, but is unmeaning in reference to existing facts, evidence may be given to show that it was used in a peculiar sense.

ILLUSTRATION

A sells to B, by deed, "my house in Calcutta".

A had no house in Calcutta, but it appears that he has a house at Howrah, of which B had been in possession since the execution of the deed.

These facts may be proved to show that the deed related to the house at Howrah.

COMMENTS

1. PRINCIPLE AND SCOPE

This section and Sections 96 and 97 deal with documents which contain latent ambiguities.

Where the language of a document is plain in itself but is unmeaning in reference to existing facts, evidence may be given to show that it was used in a peculiar sense. It is based upon the maxim falsa demonstratio non nocet (a false description does not vitiate the document).

The illustration to this section shows that if A sells to B "my house in Calcutta", and if A has no house in Calcutta but has a house in Howrah, of which B has been in possession since the execution of the deed, these facts may be proved to show that the deed related to the house in Howrah.[93]

Section 96 deals with a case where the language used might have been meant to apply to any one by several persons or things and could not have been meant to apply to more than one.

Section 97 refers to a case where the langauge in the document applies partly to one set of existing facts and partly to another set of facts as explained by the illustration thereunder.

Section 97 is a part of the rule in this section, and both the sections must be read together.

The rule regulating the admission of extrinsic evidence in the latter of these classes, i.e., cases falling within Section 97, is merely in extension and application of the rule governing the admission of extrinsic evidence in the former class of cases, i.e., cases falling within Section 95.[94] Section 95 of the Evidence Act "formulates the general rule with regard to imperfect descriptions embodied in the maxim falsa demonstrati non nocet (a false description does not vitiate the document), while the former (Section 97) deals with a particular form of imperfect description, namely, when such description applies to a double and not to a single set of facts".[95]

The rule embodied in Sections 95 and 97 is the same as that prevailing in England. Whereas all kinds of extrinsic evidence is admissible in the cases covered by the sections, in England direct declarations of intention of the maker of the instrument cannot be given.

The law in England is stated by PHIPSON as follows: (PHIPSON ON EVIDENCE, 15th Edn. (2000), Paras 43-40, page 1227) "(a) When the words of a document, in their primary or ordinary sense, are applicable to the facts, and are not modified by the context, extrinsic evidence cannot be given to show that they were not used in that sense (b). But where it is clear, either from the context or the facts, that such meaning cannot have been intended, extrinsic evidence (including surrounding circumstances, treatment and habits of speech, but not declarations of intention) may be given to show that they were used in some secondary or less ordinary sense, provided it is one which the words can properly bear."

It was held by the Privy Council that where it was impossible to reconcile the statement in an agreement for the sale of land with the recitals in the schedule as to the extent of the land to be conveyed, extrinsic parol evidence is admissible to explain the facts that led to the execution of the document in order to reconcile the conflicting statements in regard to the property sold.[1]

Where the words of a grant are clear, certain, and unambiguous they should be interpreted in their plain ordinary grammatical meaning, but where they give rise to latent ambiguity extrinsic evidence would be admissible for construing the grant.[2]

Where a Jalkar "situated in Mauza Moriar" was leased but in fact it was situate in a village Morsandi, it was held that the reference to Mauza Moriar was through misapprehension as the Jalkar was in the vicinity of Moriar, and oral evidence was admissible to show that what was leased out was the Jalkar in Morsandi.[3] Where there was an order of allotment referring to accommodation situated at a particular place though in fact the accommodation was situated at another place and the parties were aware which accommodation was meant by the order, it was held that under this section the allottee can adduce evidence to prove to which accommodation the order relates and the slight error in location would not make the order invalid.[4] Where two wills were executed on two different dates, and the later will raised ambiguity on the face of it as to whether it was in substitution for or in addition to the earlier one, it was held that extrinsic evidence can be admitted to ascertain the testator's intention.[5] Where a bequest was made to "A, my aurasa son" knowing that A was not his aurasa son, it was held that the misdescription was immaterial and oral evidence was admissible to show A was the legatee.[6] Where the recitals in a sale certificate though plain in themselves, do not fit in with the admitted facts namely the survey number, the names of the tenants and the area of the plot of land sold and a doubt arises that either the survey number or the names of the tenants and the area given must be wrong, extrinsic evidence was held admissible.[7]

Where a notice for forfeiture of a bond was given, stating that in case of non- appearance the amount of the bond would be forfeited to "King Emperor" instead of "State", it was held that the misdescription in the notice does not invalidate the notice.[8] Where there was a conflict between the description of area given in a compromise petition and the decree based on it, and the actual measurements, it was held that the former would prevail.[9] Where sufficient description of the premises is set forth by giving the name of the particular field or othewise, a false description added thereto (e.g., the mention of a wrong survey number) may be rejected.[10] In the case of sale of property in the execution of a decree (under Order XXI, Rule 90, C.P.C.), the doctrine was applied and the misdescription of property was ignored and the sale was upheld.[11]

It is settled law that in a private sale the area within the boundaries specified prevailed over the extent, on the application of the principle of Falsa demonstratio non nocet (false description does not vitiate). Even in the case of sale certificates (issued in court sales) in the first instance the area within the boundaries must be held to prevail over the extents. But under Sections 95 and 97 of the Evidence Act, the parties can lead extrinsic evidence to show what was the true state of affairs that is to say, whether the whole land lying within the boundaries described was taken possession of and enjoyed in fact or only the extent specified was taken possession of and enjoyed. The real intention of the parties has to be gathered not merely from what is set out ex facie in the document in question, but also from the extrinsic evidence of user.[12]

In a contract of sale where there was conflict between the boundaries given for the land and extent of the area, it was held that the intention must be gathered from the circumstances that led to the contract of sale.[13]

2. SECURITY BONDS

Where the words or terms of a security bond which was ordered by the court to be given, are ambiguous, the bond is to be construed in the light of the order of the court and the antecedent circumstances.[14]

Evidence as to application of language which can apply to one only of several persons.

S. 96. When the facts are such that the language used might have been meant to apply to any one, and could not have been meant to apply to more than one, of several persons or things, evidence may be given of facts which show which of those persons or things it was intended to apply to.

ILLUSTRATIONS

(a) A agrees to sell to B, for Rs. 1,000, "my white horse". A has two white horses. Evidence may be given of facts which show which of them was meant.

(b) A agrees to accompany B to Haidarabad. Evidence may be given of facts showing whether Haidarabad in the Dekkhan or Haidarabad in Sind was meant.

COMMENTS

1. PRINCIPLE AND SCOPE

This section also deals with latent ambiguity. In this section, the ambiguity arises when the facts in the language of the document are meant to apply to one, but they may also mean as applying to more than one person or thing. Illustrations (a) and (b) amply demonstrate, how the latent ambiguity would arise from the words in the document.

In illus. (a) selling of a white horse is a fact which is clear and unambiguous because "a horse" means only one horse. As the vendor had two white horses the ambiguity arises as to which horse was intended to be sold. Similarly, in illus. (b) to which Hyderabad A agreed to accompany B is the ambiguity. To have the clarification of the fact, declaration of the intention by the party who agreed either to sell or to accompany illus. (a) and (b) would become necessary and such evidence may be given under this section.

Where the language of a document, though intended to apply to one person or thing only, applies equally to two or more, and it is impossible to gather from the context which was intended, an equivocation arises, e.g., when the same name or description fits two persons or things accurately; when the same name or description fits two objects equally but subject to a common inaccuracy, provided that the inaccuracy be a mere blank or applicable to no other person or thing.

This section modifies the rule laid down in Section 94 by providing that where the language of a document correctly describes two sets of circumstances but could not have been intended to apply to both, evidence may be given to show to which set it was intended to apply. Here the language is certain. The doubt as to which of similar persons or things the language applies has been introduced by extrinsic evidence.[15]

STEPHEN in his Digest (Art. 91) observed "Proof may be given of every fact which identifies any person or thing mentioned in a document in which the relation of the words to facts has to be ascertained. If the language of the document, though plain in itself, applies equally well to more objects than one, evidence may be given, both of the circumstances of the case and of the statements made by any party to the document, and as to his intentions in reference to the matter to which the document relates."

This type of latent ambiguity is known as "Equivocation". This ambiguity is not discovered till the instrument is sought to be applied to external circumstances. Extrinsic evidence including the declarations of intention of the author of the document is allowed to be admitted by this section to show to which person or thing the words were intended to apply.[16]

The Principle in Sections 96 and 97 is based on the Maxims "Veritas nominis tollit errorem demonstrationem; nihil facit error nominis cum de corpore constat; falsa demonstratio non nocet cum ae corpore constat." All the three maxims mean that a false description does not vitiate a document.

PHIPSON (PHIPSON ON EVIDENCE, 15th Edn. (2000), Paras 43-52, p. 1237) states "When the language of a document, though intended to apply to one person or thing only, is equally applicable in all its parts to two or more, and it is impossible to gather from the context which was intended, an equivocation arises, and in addition to the evidence admissible under former rules, (Proviso 6 to Section 92, Sections 95, 97) direct declarations of the writer's intention may be given to solve the ambiguity."

WIGRAM gives the rule as follows:

Where the object of the testator's bounty or the subject of disposition (i.e. the person or thing intended), is described in terms which are applicable indifferently to more than one person or thing, evidence is admissible to prove which of the persons or things so described was intended by the testator.

(See also Section 80 Indian Succession Act Deo v. Hiscocks.[17] In this case a Government notification was in relation to 'Hossainpur' and there were two places 'Hossainpur' and land of 'Hossainpur Mouza'. It was held extrinsic evidence was admissible to show which place was intended.

The Madras High Court in M. Achuttan v. T. Achuttan[18] held that where a pronote bears both English and Malayalam dates, the correct date has to be decided by allowing evidence under Section 96. Extrinsic evidence is admissible to show to which of two debts an acknowledgment was intended to apply.[19]

One testatrix in her will bequeathed "my five row diamond bracelet" to one person and another bequest was given to another stating "my diamond chain bracelet". As a fact she owned only one diamond bracelet with eight rows of diamonds. It was held that as there was latent ambiguity extrinsic evidence was admissible and as the article being divisible each beneficiary was entitled to a moiety.[20]

Evidence of conduct comes within this section.[21] Where an agreement of reference to arbitration does not refer to the disputes referred, the conduct of the parties is admissible to find out what disputes were referred.[22]

Evidence as to application of language to one of two sets of facts, to neither of which the whole correctly applies.

S. 97. When the language used applies partly to one set of existing facts, and partly to another set of existing facts, but the whole of it does not apply correctly to either, evidence may be given to show to which of the two it was meant to apply.

ILLUSTRATION

A agrees to sell to B "my land at X in the occupation of Y". A has land at X, but not in the occupation of Y, and he has land in the occupation of Y, but it is not at X. Evidence may be given of facts showing which he meant to sell.

COMMENTS

the facts are taken together they would not apply to either. In such cases extrinsic evidence may be given to show to which of the two, the language was meant to apply.

This section is based upon the maxim falsa demonstratio non nocet.

Sections 95, 96 and 97 all deal with latent ambiguity. "Where in a written instrument the description of the person or thing intended is applicable with legal certainty to each of serveral subjects, extrinsic evidence, including proof of declarations of intention, is admissible to establish which of such subjects was intended by the author." (TAYLOR, 12th Edn., S. 1226, p. 787). The rule rejecting erroneous description not substantially important is applicable only where there is enough to show the intention clearly.

The illustration to this section shows that if A agrees to sell to B "my land at X in the occupation of Y", and A has land at X but not in the occupation of Y, and has land in the occupation of Y but it is not at X, evidence may be given to show which land was intended to be sold.

Another common case is where land within certain boundaries is sold and is wrongly described as containing a certain area, the error in area is regarded as a mere misdescription and does not vitiate the deed. The maxim falsa demonstratio non nocet applies.[23]

Where the document of sale, mentions the boundaries which indicate that the whole plot was sold, but another part of it shows the survey number which indicates that only part of the plot was the subject-matter of sale, extrinsic evidence is admisible to show whether the whole or only a part of the plot is intended to be sold.[24] Where a statement in the document was in conflict with the schedule, as to the extent of land to be conveyed under the document, it was held that parol evidence was admissible to explain the fact that led to the execution of the agreement in order to reconcile the different statement in respect of the property sold.[25] Where there was an agreement by a vendor to sell his land to several persons, but in the body of the agreement only one person was named and "to others" was added it was held that parol evidence is admissible to identify the other vendees.[26]

Where a bequest was made by a person to his 'wife Caroline' whom he had married after his wife Mary left him (though Caroline was not his legally wedded wife as the marriage was bigamous) it was held that Caroline took the legacy.[27]

1. PRINCIPLE AND SCOPE

This section enables the party to give evidence to show the meaning of illegible or not commonly intelligible characters, foreign, obsolate, technical, local and provincial expressions, of abbreviations and of words used in a peculiar sense. Section 45 of this Act says the opinion of experts or specially skilled persons in regard to foreign law, Science or Art or as to handwriting or finger impressions, is relevant.

Under Section 49 the opinion of persons having special means of knowledge in regard to meaning of words or terms used in particular districts or by particular class of people or of usages and tenents is relevant. For the purpose of this section such opinion referred to in Sections 45 and 49 can be obtained, Section 57, clause (13) provides that on all matters of public history, literature, science or art the court may resort for its aid, to appropriate books or documents of reference.

Section 92, proviso (5) speaks of usage or custom in regard to which parol evidence is admissible but such evidence should not be repugnant to or inconsistant with the terms of the contract.

The evidence cannot properly be said to vary the written instrument; it only explains the meaning of expressions used. Mercantile usage has given special meanings to many ordinary words. Evidence of the meaning which these words bear in mercantile transactions can be given under this section.

The principle upon which words are to be construed in instruments is very plain. Where there is a popular and common word used in an instrument, that word must be construed prima facie in its popular and common sense. If it is a word of a technical or legal character it must be construed according to its technical or legal meaning. If it is a word which is of a technical and scientific character, then it must be construed according to that which is its primary meaning, namely, its technical and scientific meaning. But before you can give evidence of the secondary meaning of a word, you must satisfy the court from the instrument itself or from the circumstances of the case that the word ought to be construed, not in its popular or primary signification, but according to its secondary intention.[28]

Where the point in dispute is as to the meaning of a particular word in the document, evidence may be admitted to show in what peculiar sense that particular word is used, and extrinsic evidence including the evidence regarding the subsequent conduct of the parties is admissible to determine the effect of the instrument as well as the intention of the parties.[29]

WIGMORE on Evidence (Section 2465) states: "There is no reason, in the nature of things, why the individual parties to a transaction may not employ words in a particular sense, irrespective of the ordinary or popular sense; because what we are seeking, in interpretation, is their actual standard, and the popular standard is merely taken provisionally, as presumably theirs. It can thus be, in theory, only a question of fact in each case whether the parties were using a special mutual sense..... there is no transaction whatever in which, for some idea or other, the parties do not use words in a sense of their own. Having themselves locked up the idea in the words. They themselves must furnish the key to unlock it."

Notes in shorthand are 'not commonly intelligible characters and abbreviations' within the meaning of this section. But the report of a shorthand writer is strictly speaking not substantive evidence and can be used only as part of the oral evidence.[30]

The illustration to this section is based on Goblet v. Beechey[31] where the question was as to the meaning of 'modtools for carving' which were the subject of a bequest by a sculptor. The opinions of statuaries was admitted to prove that there were no such tools as modelling tools for carving and that the word 'mod' would be understood by a sculptor as an abbreviation for models.[32]

Where a subsequent inventor claimed a particular invention and the question was whether he used the specification of a prior invention the Privy Council held that it is a question of construction and parol evidence is admissible only for the purpose of explaining the words or symbols of art and other such like technical matters and of informing the court of relevant surrounding circumstances.[33]

It was held that the word 'year' in theatrical usage meant those parts of the year during which the theatre was open.[34]

Where gas meters were to be inspected "daily" it was held that the practice of the parties that they are not inspected on Sundays was held inadmissible.[35]

2. ILLEGIBLE OR NOT COMMONLY INTELLIGIBLE CHARACTERS ETC.

In regard to meaning of the vernacular words (e.g. Herkmi, Malguzari, Jama etc.,) it was held by the Privy Council that it is desirable that the word used in vernacular should be inserted in brackets after the English rendering for assisting the court to determine which meaning is applicable to a particular case.[38]

It is the duty of the court to act upon an official translation unless its rejection is justified by an expert.[39]

A judge shall not attempt to translate, however qualified to translate, as he is not a witness and also the parties cannot test his translation.[40]

S. 99. Persons who are not parties to a document, or their representatives in interest, may give evidence of any facts tending to show a contemporaneous agreement varying the terms of the document.

ILLUSTRATION

A and B make a contract in writing that B shall sell A certain cotton, to be paid for on delivery. At the same time they make an oral agreement that three months' credit shall be given to A. This could not be shown as between A and B, but it might be shown by C, if it affected his interest.

COMMENTS

1. PRINCIPLE AND SCOPE

This section enables strangers to give evidence of any facts tending to show a contemporaneous agreement varying the terms of the original document.

Section 92 forbids the admission of evidence of an oral agreement for the purpose of contradicting, varying, adding to, or subtracting from, the terms of a written document as between the parties to such document or their representatives-in-interest.

The principle of Section 92 does not apply to third persons. If it were otherwise, third persons might be prejudiced by things recited in the writings, contrary to the truth, through the ignorance, carelessness, or fraud of the parties, and therefore, ought not to be precluded from proving the truth, however contradictory it may be to the written statements of others.[41]

On the contrary, this section distinctly provides that persons who are not parties to a document may give evidence tending to show a contemporaneous agreement varying the terms of the document.[42]

The illustration explains the principle of this section.

2. VARYING

In this section the word "varying" only is used, while in S. 92 the words are "contradicting, varying, adding to, or subtracting from". But it is difficult to see that in using the term "varying" only, anything less could have been meant than what is conveyed by the several expressions in S. 92 and as every

"contradicting," "adding to", or "subtracting from" would necessarily be a "varying" of the instrument, the Legislature apparently used that expression as sufficient to convey all that is denoted by the other different expressions occurring in the earlier section.[43]

The Supreme Court also observed "There is no doubt that S. 92 does not apply to strangers who are not bound or affected by the terms of the document. Persons other than those who are parties to the document are not precluded from giving extrinsic evidence to contradict, vary, add to or subtract from the terms of the document. It is only where a question arises about the effect of the document as between the parties or their representatives-in-interest that the rule enunciated by Section 92 about the exclusion of oral agreement can be invoked. This position is made absolutely clear by the provisions of Section 99 itself. Section 99 provides that "persons who are not parties to a document or their representatives-in-interest, may give evidence of any facts tending to show a contemporaneous agreement varying the terms of the document." Though it is only variation which is specifically mentioned in Section 99, there can be no doubt that the third party's right to lead evidence which is recognised by Section 99 would include a right to lead evidence not only to vary the terms of the document, but to contradict the said terms or to add to or subtract from them. In that case the official assignee sought a declaration that a deed of gift executed by the insolvent was void. The appellants pleaded that the transaction was in reality a transfer for consideration. The official assignee objected that the evidence that was sought to be led in support of the plea was inadmissible. The Supreme Court held that the official assignee was not a representative of the insolvent and Section 92 did not apply."[44]

A stranger can show that the document of sale is really a deed of gift.[45]

The mortgagrs or their representatives cannot be permitted to say that they have no interest in the property that was mortgaged, but third parties to it can question the mortgagor's title to that property.[46]

Though a document ex facie shows that it is a mortgage, contemporaneous oral agreement to treat it as a sale can be proved by strangers to the document.[47]

The plaintiff sued to recover one-fourth of the price of a house alleged to have been sold by the first defendant, the claim being based upon a local custom. The transaction between the defendants was ostensibly not a sale but a usufructuary mortgage. It was held that the plaintiff, not being a party to the transaction, was entitled to give evidence to show that what purported to be a usufructuary mortgage was not in reality such, but was in fact a sale.[48]

In the case of an alienation of land in which a document has been executed purporting to be a deed of gift or mortgage, it is open to a third party claiming to exercise a right of pre-emption to prove that the transaction was in reality one of sale, and that the document sought to be impugned was executed in order to conceal its real nature and to defraud him of his legal rights.[49]

Contemporaneous oral agreement for repurchasing the property sold, can be proved by strangers and not by the vendor of the sale deed.[50]

PRODUCTION AND EFFECT OF EVIDENCE

CHAPTER VII

THE BURDEN OF PROOF

Burden of proof

S. 101. Whoever desires any Court to give judgment as to any legal right or liability dependent on the existence of facts which he asserts, must prove that those facts exist.

When a person is bound to prove the existence of any fact, it is said that the burden of proof lies on that person.

COMMENTS

1. PRINCIPLE AND SCOPE

Part III of the Act deals with the production and effect of evidence in five chapters namely Chapters VII to XI. Chapter VII deals with matters relating to burden of proof. Section 2 defines 'proved' by stating that "a fact is said to be proved when after considering the matters before it, the court either believes it to exist, or considers its existence so probable that a prudent man ought under the circumstances of the particular case, to act upon the supposition that it exists". Therefore proof means that "matter" from which the court either believes the existence of a fact or considers its existence so probable that a prudent man should act upon the supposition that it exists.

Section 101 attempts to define burden of proof. This provision proceeds to say in positive terms as to the person on whom burden of proof lies whereas Section 102 puts it in negative terms. These two provisions deal with a general situation and lay down general propositions, whereas sections 103 to Section 113-B deal with specific situations and can be viewed as exceptions to the general rule. While dealing with the specific situations, the provisions also mention about the presumptions which the court may or shall presume as well as what would be conclusive proof. See Section 4 for the difference between "may presume", "shall presume" and "conclusive proof".

The term onus probandi, in its proper use, merely means that, if a fact has to be proved, the person whose interest it is to prove it, should adduce some evidence, however slight, upon which a Court could find the fact he desires the court to find. It does not mean that he shall call all conceivable or available evidence.

The general rule that a party who desires to move the Court must prove all facts necessary for that purpose (sections 101-105) is subject to two exceptions:—

(a) he will not be required to prove such facts as are especially within the knowledge of the other party (Section 106); and

(b) he will not be required to prove so much of his allegations in respect of which there is any presumption of law (sections 107-113), or in some cases, of fact (Section 114) in his favour. For example, a very old man donated land and later sued for possession on the ground that the gift was not voluntary. The burden was upon the donee.[1]

The burden of proof lies on the party who substantially asserts the affirmative of the issue and not upon the party who denies it. This rule of convenience has been adopted in practice, not because it is impossible to prove a negative, but because the negative does not admit of the direct and simple proof of which the affirmative is capable. Moreover, it is but reasonable and just that the suitor who relies upon the existence of a fact, should be called upon to prove his own case. In the application of this rule, regard must be had to the substance and effect of the issue, and not to its grammatical form, for in many cases the party, by making a slight alteration in the drawing of his pleadings, may give the issue a negative or affirmative form, at his pleasure.[2]

The party on whom the onus of proof lies must, in order to succeed, establish a prima facie case. He cannot, on failure to do so, take advantage of the weakness of his adversary's case. He must succeed by the strength of his own right and the clearness of his own proof.

This expression means two different things. It means sometimes that a party is required to prove an allegation before judgment can be given in its favour; it also means that on a contested issue one of the two contending parties has to introduce evidence. The burden of proof is of importance where by reason of not discharging the burden which was put upon it, a party must eventually fail.[3]

In PHIPSON on Evidence, 13th Edn., Page 44, Para 4-03, it is observed: "The phrase, burden of proof, has three meanings: (1) the persuasive burden, the burden of proof as a matter of law and pleading the burden of establishing a case, whether by preponderance of evidence or beyond a reasonable doubt (Also referred to as the "legal burden"[4]. We prefer the term "persuasive burden" as being, we think, the more common use and in any event being easier to understandd (see WILLIAMS, CRIMINAL LAW: The General Part, Chapters 2, 3). (2) the evidential burden, the burden of proof in the sense of adducing evidence (The phrase "evidential burden" is described by PROFESSOR CROSS (5th ed. p. 87), as accurate and as a phrase which is coming to be increasingly used by the English Judges. LORD DEVLIN however thought it confusing.[5] We agree with PROFESSOR CROSS that it is both accurate and now in common use). (3) the burden of establishing the admissibility of evidence. HALSBURY, Vol. 17, Page: 11, it is observed: "There are at least two distinct senses in which burden of proof is used.[6], and clarity over which sense is relevant at any given time is essential[7]. The legal burden is the burden of proof which remains constant throughout a trial (This is the preferable view. The incidence of the burden on different issues may lie in different places, and issues may rise or fall according to the facts proved,[8] but on the analysis of issue the legal burden will not change[9] it is the burden of establishing the facts and contentions which will support a party's case. If at the conclusion of the trail he has failed to establish these to the appropriate standard, he will lose[10]. The incidence of this burden is usually clear from the pleadings, it usually being incumbent upon the plaintiff to prove what he contends.[11] The evidential burden, however, may shift from one party to another as the trial progresses according to the balance of evidence given at any particular stage; this burden rests upon the party who would fail if no evidence at all, or no further evidence, as the case may be, was adduced by either side.[12]

STEPHEN in his digest (125, 128) states that "The primary meaning of the word "burden of proof" could have other applications and various writers have discussed the burden of proof in relation to its subject matter, such as the proof of issues and of individual facts relevant to or within an issue."

Regarding the second sense of the phrase, namely introducing evidence STEPHEN'S DIGEST (7th Ed. Article 95, p. 109) observed: "The burden of proof, in any proceeding, lies at first on that party against whom the judgement of the court would be given, if no evidence at all were produced on either side, regard being had to any presumption, which may appear upon the pleadings. As the proceedings goes on, the burden of proof may be shifted from the party on whom it rested at first, by his proving facts which raise a presumption in his favour." At page 112, it was observed: "That this rule holds equally as to matters which are not the subject of express allegation, but relate to the admissibility of evidence or the construction of documents, e.g., if either party desired to give secondary evidence of a lost deed, the burden of proving the loss is upon him."

What is called burden of proof on the pleadings should not be confused with the burden of adducing evidence which is described as shifting. The burden of proof on the pleadings never shifts, it always remains constant. The initial burden of proving a prima facie case in his favour is cast on the plaintiff; when he gives such evidence as will support a prima facie case, the onus shifts on to the defendant to adduce rebutting evidence to meet the case made out by the plaintiff. As the case continues to develop, the onus may shift back again to the plaintiff. It is not easy to decide at what particular stage in the course of the evidence the onus shifts from one side to the other.[13]

In SENGUPTA on Evidence, Page: 715, it is observed: "Onus of proof in its primary sense means the duty of establishing a case. This remains throughout the entire case exactly where the pleadings originally placed it. It never shifts. It is a question of law. In its secondary sense onus means no more than the duty of adducing evidence and in this sense, the burden may shift constantly throughtout the trial. This involves no question of law but one of fact only."[14]

The question of onus probandi is certainly important in the early stages of a case. It may also assume importance where no evidence at all is led on the question in dispute by either side; in such a contingency the party on whom the onus lies to prove a certain fact must fail. Where, however, evidence has been led by the contesting parties on the question in issue, abstract considerations of onus are out of place; truth or otherwise of the case must always be adjudged on the evidence led by the parties.[15]

Supreme Court observed: "Defendant who is in possession of account books kept by him and from which the balance could be ascertained should produce them before Court. He cannot be heard to say, relying upon the abstract doctrine of onus of proof, that it was no part of his duty to produce them unless he was called upon to do so".[16]

It was observed: "A person who seeks to displace the natural succession to property by alleging an adoption must discharge the burden that lies upon him by proof of the factum of adoption and its validity. The evidence in proof of the adoption should be free from all suspicion of fraud and so consistent and probable as to give no occasion for doubting its truth. Nonetheless the fact of adoption must be proved in the same way as any other fact.[17]

Where a party in possession of best evidence which would throw light on his issue in controversy withholds it, the court ought to draw an adverse inference against him not withstanding that the onus of proof does not lie on him. Party cannot rely on abstract doctrine of onus of proof or on the fact that he was not called upon to produce it in such a case.[18]

Where both parties have already produced whatever evidence they had, the question of burden of proof ceases to be of any importance.[19]

LORD DUNEDIN in Robin's v. National Trust Company[20] observed: "Onus is always on the person who asserts a proposition of fact which is not self-evident. To assert that a man who is alive was born, requires no proof. The onus is not on the person making the assertion because it is self-evident that he has been born. But to assert that he was born on a certain date, if the date is material, requires proof; the onus is on the person making the assertion. Now in conducting any inquiry, the determining tribunal i.e., the Judge or Jury, will often find that the onus is sometimes on the side of the one contending party, sometimes on the side of the other, or as it is often expressed, that in certain circumstances the onus shifts. But onus as the determining factor of the whole case can only arise if the tribunal finds the evidence, pro and con so evenly balanced that it can come to no sure conclusion. Then the onus will determine the matter. But, if the tribunal after hearing and weighing the evidence comes to a determinate conclusion the onus has nothing to do with it and need not be further considered."[21]

LORD MAUGHAM in Constantine Jeseph Steamship Line v. Imperial Smelting Corporation Ltd[22] observed: "The burden of proof in any particular case depends on the circumstances in which the claim arises. In general the rule which applies is Ei qui affirmat non ei qui negat incumbit probatio. It is an ancient rule founded on considerations of good sense and should not be departed from without strong reasons."

When after the entire evidence is adduced, the tribunal feels it cannot make up its mind as to which of the versions is true, it will hold that the party on whom the burden lies has not discharged the burden; but if it has on the evidence no difficulty in arriving at a definite conclusion, then the burden of proof on the pleadings recedes ino the background.[23]

At the end of a case when both the parties have led evidence and the conflicting evidence can be weighed to determine which way the issue can be decided, the abstract question of burden of proof becomes academic.[24]

It was observed in Harmes v. Hinkson[25] that if no evidence was given by the party on whom the burden lies, the issue must be found against him, but this is qualified as pointed out in Robins v. National Trust Co[26] that onus as determining factor would come into play where there was no evidence on either side or where it was equally worthless or where it was equally balanced.

The determination of the question of burden of proof cannot depend on the form of the issue, but has, in a case in which onus of proof is a matter in controversy, to be argued and a ruling thereon given by the court at the appropriate stage after issues have been framed.[27]

When all the circumstances have been assertained so far as the parties have thought fit to ascertain them, discussion on the point of onus of proof becomes immaterial. The question of onus only becomes important if the circumstances are so ambiguous that a satisfactory conclusion is impossible without resort to the principles relating to burden of proof.[28]

The plaintiff cannot obviously take advantage of the weakness of the defence. The plaintiff case must stand or fall upon the evidence adduced by him.[29]

If there is any dispute as to amount claimed with regard to depreciation, then the burden of proof is on the company to prove by legal evidence. If presumption of accuracy is attached to balance sheet and profit and loss account and not to auditor's certificate, then mere production of auditor's certificate will not be conclusive.[30] Burden of proof as to correctness of balance sheet and profit and loss account is on company.[31]

In an appeal to the Central Government under Section 111(3) of the Companies Act, 1956 for refusal of registration of shares further, if there is presumption in favour of directors, then the burden of proof is on the person who is appealing against the refusal order of directors.[32]

Burden of proving that the transaction on which the alleged title is claimed is bona fide and for valuable consideration is heavily on plaintiff, when circumstances surrounding the transaction are suspicious.[33]

Once the liquidator has shown that there was a declaration of dividend amounting to misapplication of the bank's capital resulting in loss to the bank, the burden is on the directors to show that the dividend then declared had not actually been paid.[34]

Burden is on applicant to show that there has been misrepresentation which has influenced the majority or that there has been some unfair dealing, i.e., some ulterior motive of the transferor company in advising the share holders to accept the offer.[35]

Under Art. 311(1), Constitution of India, the burden of proving who was the appointing authority need not be on the employee where the point was raised and evidence was adduced by both parties.[36]

Where evidence has been led by the contesting parties on the question in issue, abstract considerations of onus are out of place and the truth or otherwise of the case must always be adjudged on the evidence led by the parties.[37]

Evidentiary admissions are not conclusive proof of the facts admitted and they may be explained or shown to be wrong but they do raise an estoppel and shift the burden of proof to the person making them or his representative-in-interest.[38]

Where there is an admission by a party the burden of proof shifts and it is for the party making the admission to explain it away.[39]

In order to come to a conclusion concerning on whom the legal burden of proof rests, in addition to the substantive law, the pleadings of the parties coupled with the documents that are produced and the admission if any, concerning such documents have to be taken to account.[40]

In the matter of proof, in a civil case, a defendant cannot take up the same stand as an accused in a criminal case. In civil cases, unlike criminal ones, it cannot be said that the benefit of reasonable doubt must necessarily go to the defendant. Even the preponderance of probabilities may serve as a good basis for decision.[41] The Supreme Court has held that in a civil case involving allegation of charges of criminal or fraudulent character insistence on proving charges clearly and beyond reasonable doubt is wrong.[42]

In every offence the prosecution must prove criminal intention on the part of the accused unless from the language used in the statute creating the offence, it is clear that an offence is committed irrespective of the intention. Intention like any other state of mind can only be proved by acts and circumstances.[43]

Burden of proof obviously is on appellant to show that the acquittal was wrong and to show conclusively that the inference of guilt the respondent is irresistible.[44]

This section lays down a test for ascertaining on which side the burden of proof lies. The section makes it clear that the initial onus is on the plaintiff. If he discharges that onus and makes out a case which entitles him to relief, the onus shifts on to the defendant to prove those circumstances, if any, which would disentitle the plaintiff to the same.

"So far as the persuasive burden is concerned, the burden of proof lies upon the party who substantially asserts the affirmative of the issue.[45] In Constantine Line v. Imperial Smelting Corporation.[46] Lord MAUGHAM said :

> "The burden of proof in any particular case depends on the circumstances in which the claim arises. In general the rule which applies is Ei qui affirmat non ei qui negat incumbit probatio.[47] It is an ancient rule founded on considerations of good sense and should not be departed from without strong reasons."

This rule is adopted principally because it is but just that he who invokes the aid of the law should be the first to prove his case; and partly because in the nature of things, a negative is more difficult to establish than an affirmative."[48] (PHIPSON ON EVIDENCE, 15th Edn. (2000), p. 56, para 4-03).

The phrase "burden of proof" is used in two distinct meanings in the law of evidence, viz., the burden of establishing a case and the burden of introducing evidence. The burden of establishing a case remains throughout the trial where it was originally placed; it never shifts. The burden of evidence may shift constantly as evidence is introduced by one side or the other. In Section 101 the phrase is used in its first meaning, and in this section in the second sense.[49]

Section 103 amplifies the general rule laid down is Section 101. It differs from Section 101. By Section 101 the party has to prove the whole of the facts which he alleges to entitle him to judgment when the burden of proofs is on him. This section provides for the proof of some one particular fact. The illustration sufficiently points out the meaning. All the facts, however numerous and complicated, which go to make up the accused's guilt, must be proved by the prosecution. If the accused wishes to prove a particular fact, his alibi for instance, he must prove it. If the prosecutor wishes to prove the case, not by independent oral testimony, but by the isolated fact of the accused's admission, or if he wishes to throw that in as an additional fact, he must prove it (NORTON, 289). The plea of alibi must be substantiated by the accused. The trial court pointed out several suspicions throwing considerable doubts about the truth of the plea. The Supreme Court did not interfere.[50]

As an instance of provision of law that the proof of a particular fact shall be upon a particular person, see Section 39 of the Criminal Procedure Code, which says that all persons shall give information of the commission of certain offences to the nearest police officer or Magistrate, and throws upon such persons the burden of proving reasonable excuse for not doing so. Where a person claims a right of way, he must prove that he acquired the right and it is not for the other party to show that he does not have any such right.[51] Where a person is protesting against nationalisation of a route, burden lies upon him to show that the scheme would not serve national purpose.[52]

The nature of proceeding before the Commission under the Commission of Enquiry Act is fact finding, hence the Evidence Act is not applicable to it and orders passed by the Commission imposing burden on the affected persons to lead their evidence first in an incident concerning killing of ten persons by the police firing,[53] cannot be interfered with by the High Court.

2. APPEALS

Where a party accepts the burden which is laid upon it by the trial Court without any demur or protest and allows the case to proceed on that basis throughout the trial, it cannot, when it fails to discharge it, turn round and say in appeal that the burden should not have been placed upon it.[54]

It was held by the Privy Council that where the burden of proof was wrongly placed on a party by the court, a serious prejudice would be caused to the party concerned and it is open to the superior court to decide the case by placing the correct burden of proof on the proper party.[55] It was held by the Supreme Court that an error in placing the onus of proof is a serious defect of proceedure of sufficient gravity to justify interference by the appellate court if it is found that the finding of fact was the result of such a wrong approach.[56] However it has been held in some case that the finding of the lower appellate court cannot be assailed in second appeal on the ground of wrong placing of onus.[57]

Remand is not necessary when entire evidence is before High Court in second appeal and by mistake the burden is wrongly placed which can be corrected in second appeal.[58]

When all the relevant evidence has been given by the parties, the real matters for the appellate court to consider is whether the party on whom the burden lay has discharged it.[59]

Question whether onus is rightly placed on a party is a question of law.[60]

Revision against an order refusing to change the onus of an isue is not maintainable.[61]

In appeals under Section 116-A of the Representation of the People Act, the court should normally attach importance to the findings of fact recorded by the tribunal when the said findings are given on the appreciation oral evidence.[62]

A concurrent finding of two courts below is a finding which is binding in appeal under Article 136 of the Constitution and the onus to prove that finding is erronous is on the appellant.[63]

3. BURDEN OF PROOF IN CIVIL CASES

In a suit for restraining defendants from entering upon disputed land and interfering with cultivation of plaintiffs, the onus of proving acquisition of permanent occupancy interest was on defendants who claimed that they had acquired occupancy rights over suit land under Madras Act.[64] Burden of proving sufficient ground for transfer is on applicant under Section 24, C.P.C.[65] The burden of proof is on the plaintiff who asserts a right and it may be, having regard to the circumstances of each case, that the onus of proof may shift to the defendant.[66] The plaintiff must establish his case and he will not automatically succeed merely because of the failure of the defendant to establish his case[67] but onus to prove claim need not be followed in all circumstances. The Court can take the evidence of a witness wishing to leave the jurisdiction of the Court on the ground of ill health, forthwith in the presence of the parties on the date fixed. It is not necessary that issues be framed or written statements filed, before taking oral evidence.[68]

Once the defendant admits to have received the notice under Section 80 of the Code of Civil Procedure, if the defendant alleges that the notice is not in accordance with Section 80, CPC, it is for him to show to the court that it does not satisfy the requirements of law.[69]

Whoever complains against the Railway Administration that the provisions of Section 28 have been contravened must establish that there has been preference between himself and his goods on the one hand and the competitor and his goods on the other.[70] Onus to prove the alleged unreasonableness of the freight rates is on the complainant.[71]

Whenever it is necessary to prove any fact, in order to render evidence of any other fact admissible, the burden of proving that fact is on the person who wants to give such evidence. The illustrations explain the meaning of the section. A person seeking to recover possession has to prove that he was dispossessed within 12 years.[72] A father admitted that the girl whose legitimacy was in question was his daughter but that she was illegitimate. There being a presumption of legitimacy, burden lay upon father to prove otherwise.[73] Burden lies upon the plaintiff to prove all the points of the right of pre-emption.[74] In a case the plaintiff claimed half share in a house on the ground of being in joint possession and sought partition on the basis of a registered instrument and the defendant contended that the plaintiff had no right, title or interest in the said house and he was the sole owner and in exclusive possession thereof. The Courts below were satisfied with his explanation. It was held that burden lay heavily on the plaintiff to prove his case.[75] Where the plaintiffs failed to discharge their burden of proving their case, decree cannot be passed in their favour on the basis of the weakness of the defence case.[76]

This section should be read with clause (2) of Section 136 and with the illustrations attached to that section.

4. MAINTENANCE PROCEEDINGS

In a petition under Section 125, Cr.P.C., the extent of proof to establish marriage is not the same standard as is in a complaint of bigamy for offence under Section 494, I.P.C.[77]

5. BURDEN OF PROOF IN CRIMINAL CASES

"Throughout the web of the English Criminal Law, one golden thread is always to be seen that it is the duty of the prosecution to prove the prisoner's guilt subject to the exception of the defence of insanity and subject also to the statutory exceptions". (Viscount Sankey Justice).[78]

The fact that the defence case does not even seem to be reasonable, it would not mean that the prosecution case as correct because the prosecution must succeed on the strength and merits of its evidence.[79] In a criminal case, the prosecution has to discharge its onus of proving the case against the accused beyond reasonable doubt[80] and once it is established, the prosecution need not explain the injuries sustained by the accused[81] but where the prosecution case is not supported by reliable and cogent evidence, the accused is to be given the benefit of doubt.[82] The position remains the same even in a quasi-criminal charge of professional misconduct.[83]

In criminal cases it is for the prosecution to bring the guilt home to the accused. It is not correct to say that when the prosecution has adduced such evidence as the circumstances and nature of the case require, it is for the accused to establish his innocence for the reason that there is no burden laid on the prisoner to prove his innocence and it is sufficient if he succeeds in raising a doubt as to his guilt.[84] In an accusatory system, such as that prevailing in India, it is for the prosecution to prove beyond reasonable doubt that the accused committed the offence; it is not for the Court to speculate as to how the crime has been committed.[85] It is for the prosecution to determine what witnesses it should call in support of its case. Witnesses essential to the unfolding of the narrative on which the prosecution is based must be called by the prosecution, whether in the result the effect of their testimony is for or against the case for the prosecution.[86]

Prosecution cannot succeed just by showing that the defence raised is suspicious.[87] If the other circumstances point unfailingly to the guilt of the accused, the falsity of the defence can be considered as an additional link. The prosecution cannot be said to have proved as a result of failure of an accused person to prove his plea of alibi.[88] Infirmity in prosecution case can not be covered by false defence.[89]

Accused need not make a statement if he does not want to.[1] Even total silence of the accused as to any defence on his part does not lighten the prosecution burden to prove its case satisfactorily.[2] The accused denied his guilt totally but produced no evidence in defence. Even so, the prosecution has to prove its case satisfactorily. The silence of the accused being of no consequences in this context.[3] No plausible criticism of the defence evidence of the failure of the accused to establish his innocence should be deemed as sufficient to discharge the burden on the prosecution.[4]

In a criminal trial, the onus is upon the prosecution to prove the different ingredients of the offence and unless it discharges that onus it cannot succeed.[5] But where there was no evidence to show that the accused suffered the injuries in the same transaction, the prosecution was not bound to explain them.[6]

Regarding the shifting of the legal burden, it is a fundamental principle of criminal jurisprudence that an accused is presumed to be innocent and the burden lies on the prosecution to prove the guilt of the accused beyond reasonable doubt. And that burden never shifts but when the accused pleads insanity under Section 84, I.P.C., or any of the exceptions contained in I.P.C., like right of private defence etc., it is the accused that has to prove the same, though the degree of proof on the accused is not as high on the prosecution and it would be sufficient for him to satisfy the test of a standard of a prudent man.[7] In criminal trial burden of proof never shifts to the accused. If a reasonable explanation is given by the accused it would be upto the court to acquit the accused.[8]

Examining defence evidence first and then examining prosecution evidence is improper.[9]

In a criminal case it is for the State to show that the accused persons have committed the offence with which they are charged.[10] Prosecution has to prove that the Court taking cognisance has territorial jurisdiction.[11] Burden to prove the negligence of licencee and his failure to take necessary steps is on prosecution.[12] To sustain an action under Section 628, Companies Act, the prosecution must show that false statements were made in the balance sheet knowing them to be false and with dishonest intention.[13] The position of a contemner being that of an accused person, whoever alleges that a contemner has disobeyed the orders passed by the court, has to prove that fact.[14] Where motive was set up by the prosecution it was for the prosecution to prove the same.[15]

As against this heavy burden on the prosecution the accused can claim the benefit of his defence just by showing a balance of probabilities. He has not to prove his defence beyond a reasonable doubt. The prosecution proved in a case that an official had accepted a sum of money which was intended to be a bribe. The Supreme Court said that the accused must prove his justification and he can do so on a balance of probabilities and need not prove beyond reasonable doubt.[16] The burden on the accused is not as onerous as that which lies on the prosecution. While the prosecution is required to prove its case beyond reasonable doubt, the accused can discharge his onus by establishing a mere preponderance of probability.[17]

When the accused pleaded that the confession was the result of torture onus to prove torture is on him.[18] Burden is on the accused to prove that the confessional statement was obtained by threat, duress or promise and if he is able to prove the facts creating reasonable doubt that the confession was not voluntary or was obtained by threat, coercion or inducement etc., the burden would be on the prosecution to prove that the confession was made by him voluntarily.[19]

The accused must be presumed to be innocent until the prosecution has been able to establish the charge against him beyond reasonable doubt and the presumption as to innocence must continue even in an appeal against acquittal. In a criminal case there is no burden on the accused to prove his innocence.[20]

Neither Section 103, nor Section 106 can absolve prosecution from discharging its general or primary burden of proving its case beyond reasonable doubt. It is only when prosecution has led evidence which if believed will sustain conviction, or makes out a prima facie case, that the question arises of considering of whether the burden of proof may lie upon the accused.[21]

A criminal case is a 'proceeding' within the meaning of Section 102 and the burden of proof in such a proceeding lies on the prosecution for the simple reason that if neither the prosecution nor the defence leads evidence, the accused is entitled to be acquitted.[22] In cases where the evidence is of such a nature that conclusion cannot be arrived at as to who started the fight or how the quarrel started, the benefit of doubt should be given to the accused.[23]

If the prosecution evidence as a whole is unreliable and cannot be accepted as correct and if the accused is silent with regard to his defence, then the court ought not to treat the case as positively proved beyond reasonable doubt, only for reason of the failure of the accused to put up his defence immediately when he was confronted.[24]

In a case under Section 411, IPC, it is not upon the accused to prove how he came to possess the property which is said to be stolen property.[25]In India arsenic is used as medicine in all types of diseases.

Mere fact that arsenic was detected is not sufficient to prove conclusively that death was due to arsenic poisoning. Prosecution should prove that a lethal dose of arsenic, that is two grains or upwards, had been administered.[26] The prosecution has to make out that the cessation of accused from duty was intentional under Section 44, Madras District Police Act. But in an ordinary case, where no other special circumstances appear on the record, the court might well assume cessation as a fact was intentional cessation. Where, however, other circumstances appear, the requiste intention has to be clearly made out.[27]

Where a person voluntarily makes a statement about his criminal activities and he neither repudiates nor offers any reasonable explanation, it would be conclusive against him. The opposite side has no burden to establish truth of such a statement.[28]

In a case where death is due to injuries or wounds caused by a lethal weapon, it is always the duty of the prosecution to prove by expert evidence that it was likely or at least possible for the injuries to have been caused with the weapon and in the manner in which they are alleged to have been caused. It is elementary that where the prosecution has a definite or positive case, it must prove the whole of the case.[29]

When administration of poison is proved by prosecution the burden is on the accused to prove that his intention was different, since it is especially within the knowledge of the accused.[30] In a cheating case for work not done, if there is a finding that works to which the claim related were not carried out at all, then there is no burden on the prosecution to establish that the appellant had personal knowledge of the bogus nature of his claim.[31]

It is for prosecution to prove that an act is not negligent but was deliberate and intentional.[32]

When accused violated order under Section 144, Cr.P.C., denying knowledge of the orders, then the prosecution must prove circumstances from which accussed's knowledge can be inferred. Onus is then on accussed to prove ignorance of order despite publication.[33]

If an application for cancellation of bail, it is not necessary for the prosecution to prove by a mathematical certainity or even beyond a reasonable doubt that the witness have turned hostile because they are won over by the accused.[34] In considering whether a public officer is guilty of his misconduct charged against him, the rule followed in criminal trial that an offence is not established unless proved by evidence beyond reasonable doubt to the satisfaction of the court, does not apply.[35]

In an offence of cheating and false evidence the burden will never shift to the accused and if an accused gives a reasonable explanation, then the jury have to take that into account and though they are not convinced about the truth, they should acquit the accused.[36]

Failure of accused to cross-examine witnesses does not discharge burden of proof on prosecution.[37]

Burden of proving "just ground" for claiming maintenance under Section 125(3), Cr.P.C. lies on wife.[38] When an able bodied husband failed to maintain his wife and children, it is for him to show that he is incapable of doing so.[39]

Burden of proof rests on person who alleges that a particular witness is an accomplice.[40]

6. ALIBI

When it is the question of an alibi, it is not a case, of proving the existence of circumstances bringing the case within any of the general exceptions or special exceptions of the Indian Penal Code, and therefore, Section 105 of the Indian Evidence Act, does not apply. The section applicable is Section 103 illustration of which specially mentions the case of plea of alibi and provides that it is for the accused who pleads alibi to prove it.[41] Burden to prove plea of alibi is on accused pleading it.[42] Burden is on the accused who is setting up defence of alibi to prove it but even so, the burden of proving the case against the accused is on the prosecution irrespective of whether or not the accused have made out plausible defence.[43] Onus is on accused to substantiate plea of alibi and make it reasonably probable.[44]

Where the accused pleaded alibi as they were present in their office till 5 p.m. which was at a distance of about 40 miles from the scene of occurrence taking place at 7 p.m., their presence at the scene of occurrence was held to be doubtful.[45]

7. GAMBLING OFFENCES

Prosecution must prove that "Muddemal slips" (a code word) contain a record of betting transactions or were in any manner connected with betting in American futures. It is for prosecution to explain how bets in American futures are recorded and satisfy the court that the slips seized were part of the record.[46]

8. NEGLIGENCE

Burden is on prosecution which could have easily obtained necessary information, whether the vehicle had been granted a permit and what were its conditions.[47]

Onus of proof that accused drove rashly and negligently is on the prosecution.[48]

In a suit for loss, damage or non-delivery of goods, filed against the carriers, the plaintiff is not required to prove negligence ordinarily. The burden is on the defendant carrier to prove that there was no negligence on his part.[49]

9. OFFENCE UNDER SECTION 182, PENAL CODE

In regard to an offence under Section 182, IPC burden is on the prosecution to show the accused believes the information to be false.[50]

10. DISCRIMINATION

The burden to prove the charge of discrimination and arbitrary use of power by the Collector in granting compensation in land acquisition proceedings is on the party making it.[51]

11. DEFAMATION AND LIBEL

It is for accused to establish that the source of information on which he acted was proper source on which he was entitled to act and that he did so with care and circumspection.[52]

If court accepts the plaintiff's contention that the publication is per se defamatory, the question whether it amounts to libel or not is one for court to decide and not for the plaintiff to prove by adducing evidence.[53]

The defendant must not only raise the plea in his written statement but also prove it strictly by leading evidence that the defamatory remarks about the plaintiff were true. Onus to prove justification always lies on the defendant.[54]

12. CONTEMPT OF COURT

As regards the burden, the common legal phraseology "he who asserts must prove" has its due application in the matter of proof allegations said to be constituting the act of contempt.[55]

13. OFFENCE UNDER SECTION 420, PENAL CODE

In the case of an offence of cheating it is for prosecution to prove that at the time the accused entered into the transaction with the complainant, he had no intention to pay the money and that he was actuated by dishonest intention to cheat the complaint.[56]

From the fact that the ornaments are recovered at the instance of the accused, inference cannot be drawn that the accused must have murdered the deceased. Onus lies on the prosecution to prove its case.[57]

In a suit based on an alleged hand loan the burden is and will be on the plaintiff to make out that the alleged hand loan is true, that he did in fact advance the money representing the loan to the defendant on condition of repayment.[58]

14. STOLEN PROPERTY

Onus to prove that the accused was in possession of stolen property is to be first discharged by prosecution. Burden is cast upon the accused to explain the circumstances under which he came into possession.[59]

If the accused pleads that the earlier statement made by him in commital court was made under police pressure, the burden lies on the accused to establish it.[60]

Where the prosecution could not prove beyond a reasonable doubt that the accused was connected with the destruction of a film, the accused was given the benefit of doubt[61]. Recovery of articles by itself does not connect anybody with the crime. Connection of the accused with the articles must be proved beyond a reasonable doubt.[62]

15. SANCTION

Where a party desires to challenge the complaint on the ground of authority, it is for him to show that there is absence of any requisite authority to prosecute. For that purpose the court can look into and examine orders duly passed.[63] Burden of showing that requisite sanction was obtained is on prosecution and such burden includes proof that the sanctioning authority had given sanction with reference to the facts on which the prosecution is based.[64]

In order to take away the protection provided under Section 132, Cr.P.C. to persons performing their duties, the onus is on complainant to show that accused did not act under Chapter 9 of Cr.P.C. 1898 (Chapter of Cr.P.C., 1973) and therefore not entitled to protection under Section 132, Cr.P.C.[65]

Prosecution has to prove that sanctioning authority was competent to sanction prosecution and had applied its mind to the facts of the case. When the acts constituting the offence are not appearing in the order, sanctioning prosecution, it must prove the same by other evidence.[66]

When an accused person pleads Section 197, Criminal P.C. as a bar to his trial it is for him to prove the facts which bring that section into operation.[67]

16. SEXUAL OFFENCE

Prosecution has to prove beyond doubt that the girl was below 16 years of age and the burden is heavy when the girl was used to sexual intercourse.[68]

Where the inference of guilt of an accused person is to be drawn from circumstantial evidence alone, those circumstances must be established beyond reasonable doubt and they should point towards the guilt of the accused.[69]

Where a rapist confessed his guilt in writing in the presence of his parents and elders allegedly under coercion or inducement, onus of establishing coercion or inducement would be on the accused.[70]

17. PREVENTION OF CORRUPTION ACT

Before placing reliance on the prosecution under Section 4(i) of Prevention of Corruption Act of 1947 it is the duty of the prosecution to first prove the basic facts on which the prosecution rests. The burden of proving the case squarely rests on the prosecution and this burden can not be diluted simply because the charge is under Section 4(i) of the Act. Section 101 of the Evidence Act is equally applicable to such cases.[71]

In a criminal trial, for conviction of person for possession of assets disproportionate to his income, the prosecution need not disapprove all possible source of his income.[72]

In a prosecution under Prevention of Corruption Act, there are discrepencies in the oral evidence of the complaint with regard to demand of money, it could be said that the prosecution had failed to prove vital part of its case and thereby the accused is entitled for acquital.[73]

In a criminal trial in order to prove a change of criminal misappropriation under the Prevention of Corruption Act, if the nature of burden of proof on the prosecution is of a negative character, then the burden can be discharged by circumstantial evidence.[74]

Where prosecution alleges that the accused accepted or agreed to accept or attempted to obtain any gratification or valuable thing—the presumption under Section 4 will be made against the accused. This does not mean that the burden of the prosecution to establish acceptance of gratification is displaced by the section—the burden still remains on it. This proof must be in accordance with standard of proof laid down in Section 3, Evidence Act.[75] It is for the prosecution to prove by positive evidence that the accused obtained the thing from a person who is known to be related to the concerned person.[76]

Where some matter is presumed by the statute against an accused person "unless the contrary is proved" within Section 5(3), Prevention of Corruption Act (1947), the burden of proof required is less than that required at the hands of the prosecution in proving the case beyond a reasonable doubt and the burden of proof may be discharged by evidence satisfying the court of the probability of that which the accused is called upon to establish.[77]

The degree and the character of the burden of proof which Section 4(i) of Prevention of Corruption Act casts as an accused person to rebut the presumption thereunder, cannot be equated with the degree and character of proof which under Section 101, Evidence Act rests on the prosecution while the mere possibility of an explanation given by the accused is his examination under Section 342 of old Cr.P.C. (S. 313 of Cr.P.C., 1973) may not be enough, the burden on him to negate the presumption may stand discharged, if the effect of the material brought on the record, in its totality, renders the existence of the fact presumed in probable.[78]

The burden of proof lying upon the accused under Section 4(i) of the Prevention of Corruption Act will be satisfied if he establishes his case by a preponderance of possibilities as is done by a party in civil proceedings; it is not necessary that he should establish his case by the test of proof beyond a reasonable doubt.[79]

18. OFFENCE UNDER SEA CUSTOMS ACT

Mere knowledge that goods are smuggled goods is sufficient. It is not necessary for the prosecution to establish not only that the accused knew that goods were smuggled, but that he took some active part in the smuggling, thereby indicating the intention to avoid payment of duty or evade restriction. Mere possession is sufficient.[80]

19. OFFENCES RELATING TO ESSENTIAL COMMODITIES ACT

That possession of kerosene stock is for sale without licence must be proved by the prosecution.[81] Burden is on prosecution to prove that the commodity which was being exported was uncleaned turdal. It is not for accused to prove that the commodity was not uncleaned turdal.[82] It was held onus was on prosecution to prove beyond reasonable doubt that Khesari Dal kept in shop of accused was for sale for human consumption.[83] Burden to prove that the accused is a dealer within the definition is on prosecution.[84]

Under Section 15, Essential Supplies (Temporary Powers) Act, where any person is prosecuted for contravening any order made under Section 3 which prohibits him from doing an act without a permit, the burden of proving that he had such a permit shall be on him.[85] Burden to prove that the food grains are for sale lies on person who stores foodgrains.[86]

When prosecution failed to prove that the delay had no relation to incriminating excess percentage in damaged grains, it could be presumed that the sample may have been infested with fungus during that period. In such cases, the accused can be given benefit of doubt under Section 13 of the Prevention of Food Adulteration Act.[87]

20. PREVENTIVE DETENTION

An order of detention can only be challenged on ground of malice, the defence must establish mala fides on the part of the Government to secure his release.[88] Burden lies on the detenu to prove that the conduct in passing a fresh order of detention is mala fide.[89]

The initial burden has always been on the detenue to show that the order is liable to be quashed. This burden is not discharged by merely saying that he does not know why he was detained.[90]

Onus is initially upon the State to prove that the detaining authority was satisfied in respect of the necessity.[91]

21. COMPANY RESOLUTION

Where a resolution of a company was signed by its Chairman, it was held that it was for company to disprove that what was properly recorded in a resolution did not represent the correct position.[92]

Burden to prove that list of share holders was forwarded to Registrar in time is on the company.[93]

22. CLAIM CASES

In a suit for claiming exemption under Section 16(1) Provident Funds Act, the burden of establishing that the exemption under the section applied to the particular establishment is on the plaintiff.[94]

23. EVACUE PROPERTY ACT

Burden of proving property to be composite property is on custodian.[2]

24. BIHAR MONEY LENDERS' ACT

In a suit for recovery of loan without registration as money lender under the Bihar Money Lenders' Act, the burden to prove that the suit is maintainable without registration is on the plaintiff.[3]

25. A.P. LAND REFORMS (CEILING ON HOLDINGS) ACT

Burden to prove that alienations prior to 24-1-1971 were to be ignored since neither the A.P. Land Reforms (Ceiling on Holdings) Act, 1973 nor the A.P. Agricultural Lands (Prohibition of Lands) Act, 1972 bars such alienations, was on the landlord.[4]

26. URBAN LAND (CEILING AND REGULATION) ACT

Where the owner of the land in question pleaded it to be agricultural land, burden to prove the same was on him.[5]

27. EXEMPTION TO RULER

Application by Ruler to examine himself as his own witness on commission— claim of right as Ruler to be exempted from personal attendence—Burden of proving it is on Ruler.[6]

The plaintiff who wants to take advantage of an exception to a statutory bar, must clearly prove that his case is covered by the exception.[7]

28. JUDGEMENT-DEBTOR

Burden of proof is on judgment-debtor to satisfy the Court that his circumstances are such as to justify the grant of instalments in a particular manner.[8]

29. INSOLVENCY ACT

Burden is heavy on the official receiver who seeks to impeach the insolvency to prove that it was suffered by the debtor with a view to give preference to a creditor.

See Travancore Cochin Insolvency Act.[9]

30. EXECUTION OF DECREE

Onus is on the party alleging the discharge of a decree debt to prove the same.[10]

Burden is on party alleging abandonment of execution petition to prove the same.[11]

Onus to bring case within one or more clauses of proviso to Section 51, C.P.C. is on decree-holder as the judgement-debtor can not waive the privilege conferred on him viz., Section 51 of C.P.C.[12]

31. INDUSTRIAL DISPUTES ACT

When union of majority of workmen takes action on behalf of a workman, the presumption is that the action is taken in a representative character with the support of its members. It is for the company (employer) to prove that the members of the union are not behind the union.[13]

32. AGRICULTURAL RELIEF ACT

Party seeking relief under Bombay Agricultural Relief Act has to show that he is an agriculturist.[14]

Where a party claimed to be an agriculturist within meaning of Section 2, U.P. Agriculturist Relief Act, why under the proviso to that section, he is deprived of the status has to be proved by the opposite party.[15]

Section 9 of the Karnataka Debt Relief Act, casts burden on the creditor to prove that the person claiming benefit of the Act is not a debtor.[16]

33. RENT ACTS

Mere acceptance of amount equivalent to rent by a landlord from a tenant in possession after a lease had been determined by a notice to quit and who enjoys statutory inmunity from evidence because of the Rent Act, cannot be regarded as evidence of a new agreement of tenancy.[17]

Onus to prove that land was 'accommodation' covered by Section 2(a), U.P. (Temp) Control of Rent and Eviction Act, 1947, is on tenant claiming protection of Section 3 of the Act.[18]

In an eviction proceeding on the ground of bona fide need of landlord, burden lies upon him to establish that he genuinely requires the accommodation[19] and to avail the protection against eviction on the ground that no other suitable building was available in the locality for the tenant to shift his business, burden to prove the said fact was on him.[20] Where in an eviction proceeding on the ground of bona fide need, the landlord showed to be in possession of only one room which was not sufficient for his entire family whereas the tenant pleaded that the landlord was in possession of three rooms instead, the burden was on the tenant to prove his plea and not on the landlord to prove that he was not in occupation of three rooms.[21] The Bombay High Court has also held that it is open to the Court to presume the reasonable and bona fide need of the landlord and put the onus on the tenant to establish otherwise.[22] Where a landlord files an eviction petition on the ground of sub-letting, the burden of proving the parting with the possession in favour of a third party by the tenant lies on the landlord and on his discharge of the initial burden, onus shifts on the tenant to explain.[23] Onus to prove his plea that the suit premises was not vacated by him would be on the tenant[24] and also to prove that he is a tenant and not a licencee.[25]

34. RECORD OF RIGHTS

The entries in the record of rights are presumed to be correct until they are proved to be incorrect by evidence. The presumption would not apply where the entries were made not under any statute or the rules framed thereunder.[26]

35. TRADE MARKS AND PATENTS

The burden of proving that the trade mark which a person seeks to register is not likely to deceive or to cause confusion is upon the applicant. He must satisfy the Registrar that his trade mark does not fall within the prohibition of Section 8 of the Trade Marks Act, 1940.[27]

When a trade mark is an ordinary plain word, heavy onus lies upon applicant to prove that it has acquired distinctiveness.[28]

36. MRTP ACT

Burden to prove unfair trade practice lies on the person who alleges it.[29]

37. CONTRABAND

Prosecution should prove that articles brought are smuggled articles— Presumption under Section 178-A cannot be raised when article seized is not covered by Section 178(A)(2)[30].

Section 3 of Assam Opium Prohibition Act 1947 prohibits import, export, transport or possession of opium among other things. Section 5(a) provides for punishment for contravention. Section 28 lays down that unless and until the contrary is proved, it shall be presumed that the accused has committed the offence in respect of the opium for the possession of which he fails to account for satisfactorily. The Assam High Court held that possession means knowledge or consciousness of the existence of an article at a place where he could exercise dominion. Conscious possession on the part of the accused has to be established by the prosecution for the presumption under Section 28 to be raised. Burden to prove conscious possession on the part of the accused remains on the prosecution and is not shifted to the accused by anything contained in Section 28.[31]

The expression "unless and until the contarary is proved" in Section 54 (Narcotic Drugs and Psychotropic Substances Act) clearly imposes the burden of proving that the possession of the prohibited substance is legal, is on the accused himself and that dispenses entirely the prosecution from proving that possession of such substances is illegal.[32]

Where there was no evidence against accused excepting that the contraband opium was being carried in car which belonged to him, he cannot be convicted on suspicion that he was behind the same.[33]

Owing to the peculiar nature of the offence dealt with under the Act the Legislature thought it wise to put the onus of proving his innocence upon the accused person where there was a reasonable belief that he was in possession of smuggled goods and such goods were actually seized from his possession.[34]

In a case under Narcotic Drugs and Psychotropic Substances Act, 1985, it was held that the prosecution must prove that the accused was informed of her right in respect to search and seizure under S. 50(1) of the said Act.[35]

38. FOOD ADULTERATION ACT

Though the prosecution need not prove the mens rea of the accused under prevention of food adulteration, the onus to prove every essential ingredient of the offence lies on the prosecution.[36]

39. PROHIBITION CASES

Burden is on prosecution to prove that the accused committed offence under Prohibition Act.[37]

40. NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS ACT

Onus of proving good faith and absence of negligence as contemplated by Section 131, Negotiable Instruments Act is on the banker claiming protection under the Act.[38]

In case of dishonour of a cheque, the burden of proof of innocence lies on the accused drawer of the cheque and it does not run counter to the basic principle of criminal law presumption of the innocence of the accused.[39]

41. TRANSFER OF PROPERTY ACT

The rule against the coming to an end of the tenancy on the redemption of the mortgage (Section 76(a) of T.P. Act) being in the nature of an exception has to be specifically proved by the tenant inducted into possession by the mortgage. As such the burden of proof lies on the tenant to establish the bona fides of the mortgagee when tenancy is created by him in the course of management.[40]

Where the deceased had allegedly committed criminal trespass in the land of the accused who delivered two deadly knife blows on his chest and the sale-deed established the transfer of possession in favour of the father of the accused, it was for the prosecution to prove that possession of the accused was subsequently disturbed and the deceased had come into possession. The burden of proof was not on the accused to establish that their possession remained undisturbed.[41] In a case which involves determination of the question whether there has been surrender of old lease and creation of fresh lease, apart from the direct evidence the circumstantial evidence has a great role to play. While appreciating the evidence brought on records by the parties, the Court in a case of this nature must also necessarily take into consideration the normal human behaviour as also its experience in such matter. The Court in a case of this nature cannot arrive at a finding on the basis of the consideration of abstract rule of burden of proof but on consideration of the entire material on record has to arrive at a finding on the basis as to in whose favour the preponderance of probability lies. It is also a trite law that the question of onus of proof looses its importance when both sides have adduced evidence.[42] Where the executant of the sale-deeds was illiterate, burden was on the persons wanting to take advantage of the deeds to prove that the contents of the deeds were read over and explained to the executant.[43] In a transfer by an ostensible owner, the burden to prove that the ostensible owner under the registered sale-deed is only a benamidar, lies upon the person who sets up benami.[44] Where the persons challenging the execution of the sale-deeds were not present at the time of execution and the concerned parties had full knowledge of the respective cases and led evidence, the question of burden of proof had become academic.[45]

42. CONTRACT ACT—BAILOR-BAILEE

Where goods entrusted to a bailee are lost, initial presumption of negligence on his part arises and the onus to rebut the same by proving that such care as a man of ordinary prudence would have exercised was taken.[46] In the case of bailment if the damage caused were such that in the ordinary course of events it would not happen to the goods of the kind in questions, if used with ordinary prudence, it would be for the hirer to prove that he had exercised such prudence; otherwise, the owner must prove negligence.[47] Bailor has to prove negligence or lack of sufficient care on the part of bailee from the materials produced by bailee to prove negligence on his part.[48] Onus to establish special contract to escape ordinary liability as a bailee is on him who pleads the same.[49]

The same rule as to burden of proof applies to the case of a Railway Administration. See cases under Sections 151 & 152 of the Contract Act and the cases under the Heading Carriers Act.

43. CARRIERS—RAILWAYS ACT

If the loss or damage has been caused to the property during the transit, the burden of proof is on the carriers Railway Administration to prove absence of criminal act or negligence on the part of carrier or its agents or servants.[50] When there is a loss caused by criminal act of carrier or his servant, then it is for carrier to prove that no criminal act was committed by him or his agent or servant.[51]

The value of goods and extent of damage have to be proved by the claimant because the railway certificate is not the final thing.[52]

Where railways had to prove that the goods were not lost within seven days of the end of transit and offered no evidence, their case fails.[53]

Provision imposing burden on one set of common carriers only, without a similar burden being cast on other common carriers like Railways and Airways, is not violative of Article 14 of the Constitution of India.[54]

If his foods were consigned on one Railway and delivered on another Railway in a damaged condition, then the burden of proof is on delivering railway to prove that the damage did not occur in its Railway.[55] When the goods are consigned at Railway risk and there is shortage in delivery on account of pilferage in transit the case comes with the general responsibility of the Railway Administration under Section 73 and the onus will lie upon the Railway to prove that they had taken reasonable care, even if the goods were proved to have been defectively packed by the consignor.[56]

When the Railway pleads loss due to looting by riotuous mob, it is for them to place all necessary materials for a proper inference.[57] Burden to prove negligence and misconduct on the part of Railway Administration, is on the plaintiff. When there is a loss occurred in deviation from agreed route or goods were not properly packed or destroyed by fire, the onus is on the Railway Administration in view of Section 74 of the Railway Act.[58] Where a person sending parcel for carriage by railways has not declared the value of goods and there is a loss of the parcel then the burden lies on Railway Administration to prove loss.[59] When the Railway Administration pleads for the dismissal of the suits on the ground of limitation, it has to establish that the loss occurred beyond one year from the date of institution of the suits.[60]

Section 9 of the Carriers Act relieves the plaintiff of proving negligence. The carrier must exonerate himself from liability.[61]When a Consignor or agent signed the declaration expressly agreeing to all conditions in the consignment note, burden lies upon him to show that the signature was secured by fraud or misrepresentation or that he had no notice of the conditions[62].

44. LAND GRABBING

In an allegation that certain parties are landgrabbers, the initial evidence as to the said allegation is to be adduced by the complainant in the first instant and not by the persons against whom allegation has been made.[63]

45. SEIZURE AND AUCTION

Where a bank seized a vehicle and auctioned the same asserting that it did so in exercise of its legal rights, onus was on the bank to prove its assertion and not on the plaintiff.[64]

On whom burden of proof lies.

S. 102. The burden of proof in a suit or proceeding lies on that person who would fail if no evidence at all were given on either side.

(a) A sues B for land of which B is in possession, and which, as A asserts, was left to A by the will of C, B's father.

If no evidence were given on either side, B would be entitled to retain his possession.

Therefore the burden of proof is on A.

(b) A sues B for money due on a bond.

The execution of the bond is admitted, but B says that it was obtained by fraud, which A denies.

If no evidence were given on either side, A would succeed, as the bond is not disputed and fraud is not proved.

Therefore the burden of proof is on B.

COMMENTS

1. ABANDONMENT

Abandonment must be proved affirmatively by the person who sets up by unimpeachable evidence.[1]

1. Y.C. Rattayya v. D. Venkata Ramayya, AIR 1959 AP 551; Kanhiya Shanker v. Mohabata Sedhu, AIR 1960 Punj 494; Nemsnath Appayya v. Jamboo Rao.

2. ABATEMENT

Where a tenant claims abatement of rent on account of diluvion and the landlord admits or it is proved that some diluvion has taken place, the onus is upon the tenant to prove the extent of the diluvion and the corresponding abatement claimed.[2]

3. ACCOUNTS

There is no presumption that in a suit for accounts, the accounts produced by the legal representative, as being that of the deceased accounting party, are either genuine or correct. But since the original accounting party is not available, they must be treated as 'prima facie' accounts of the deceased, and it would be for the plaintiff to prove that they are not genuine or correct.[3]

In a suit for recovery of amount due on the basis of adjustment of amounts signed by defendant, if the defendant denied the correctness of amount found due, then the defendant who is in possession of account books, from which the balance could be assertained should produce them before the court. He cannot be heard to say, relying upon the abstract doctrine of onus of proof, that it was not part of his duty to produce them unless he was called upon to do so.[4]

4. ACQUIESCENCE, ADMISSION, ESTOPPEL AND WAIVER

The onus is on the person who pleads estoppel[5]. The burden is on the insurer to show the breach of the conditions of the policy for avoiding its liability.[6]

The person who sets up a plea that the admission contained is an unregistered document, either admitted or proved, is, as a matter of fact, false the burden lies on him to prove that fact.[7] Burden of proving contrary to admission of adoption in a registered deed lies on him making admission.[8] Onus is heavy on a person to show that recitals in document as to admission made by him while executing the document are untrue or tainted with illegality or the untrue statements were made with set purpose.[9]

Onus of proof is on judgment-debtor to prove waiver on part of decree holder to exercise a right which had arisen under the decree when acceptance of money after default took place.[10] Burden of proof is on the purchaser to establish the waiver of right by other co-heirs.[11]

5. ADOPTION

A party who is seeking to establish adoption displacing the right of the natural heirs has to prove strictly not only the factum of adoption but also its validity, but where there is long lapse of time between the adoption and when it was questioned, absence of some evidence in proof of adoption can be favourably entertained and the burden shifts on the otherside and the burden rests heavily on him who challenged its validity.[12] A person who seeks to displace the natural succession to property by alleging an adoption must discharge the burden that lies upon him by proof of the factum of adoption and its validity. The evidence in proof of the adoption should be free from all suspicion of fraud and so consistent and probable as to give no occasion for doubting its truth. Nonetheless the fact of adoption must be proved in the same way as any other fact.[13]

It is for the adopted son to prove his giving by his natural father and taking by the adoptive father and his title as an adopted son.[14]

Where an adoption was recognised by all members of family for over fifty years, strong presumption in favour of its validity arises. A heavy burden lies on reversioner challenging it to prove his allegation that it is invalid on the ground of the adoptive mother lacking competence to adopt.[15]

See Hindu Law—Adoption.

6. ADVERSE POSSESSION

Burden of making out ouster is on person claiming to displace lawful co-heirs, by adverse possession.[16] A person who is in long possession of property can undoubtedly maintain a suit to turn out a trespasser on the property, as it is the trespasser who is to show a title better than that of the plaintiff if the plaintiffs long possession is otherwise established.[17] Where a widow in joint family took over possession or some family property, the onus is on person who asserts that her possession is not adverse, to show it.[18]

If there is no evidence of open assertion of hostile title against the plaintiff, and no fault indicative of ouster was proved to have taken place any time 12 years before the date of the suit, then the plea of adverse possession must fail as the burden in this behalf squarely is upon the defendant.[19] For a plaintiff to succeed in getting possession basing on his title he has to prove that he was in possession within 12 years of the suit; the onus is not on the defendant to prove adverse possession for a period of 12 years.[20]

In a suit for possession, the plaintiff failed to prove title, it was held that in such a case it is not necessary for the defendant to prove his title.The plaintiff suit will be dismissed irrespective of the fact whether the defendant had any right in the property or not, and he cannot succeed on the weakness of the defendant's case.[21]

In a suit against Government for declaration of title based on adverse, possession the onus of proving possession, for 60 years is on plaintiff. Mere proof of long possession does not shift the onus to the State to prove its title and possession within 60 years proceeding the suit.[22]

7. AGREEMENT

If an agreement is challenged as being a restraint of trade, then the onus of showing that restrictions were reasonably necessary to his interest is on the party who is supporting the contract.[23]

8. ALIENATION

It is well-settled that it is for the party who wants the court to uphold the alienation of debuttar property to prove that the alienation was made for legal necessity.[24]

Under no circumstances, the initial onus which is on the purchaser shifts on the plaintiff at the first stage even when the plaintiff states in the plaint why he makes the subsequent purchaser a party and how he came to know that the person concerned was the subsequent purchaser.[25]

The burden of proving that the plaintiff had knowledge of the alienations 12 years prior to the date of suit was on the alienee defendants.[26]

9. ARBITRATION

The onus is on the person who asserts that consent of one of the parties to an arbitration was obtained by threats or through undue influence.[27]

10. ASSESSMENT TO AND RECOVERY OF TAX

In a contract for work involving transfers of contracted goods, the burden of showing that transfer of goods constituted taxable sale is on Revenue Authority.[28]

When sufficient evidence either direct or circumstantial is disclosed by Revenue Authority and the assessee fails to put before department material in his exclusive possession then adverse inference can be drawn against assessee.[29] Where the assessee fails to show that the assessment is prima facie wrong, the taxing authority is under no obligation to prove that it is justified.[30]

Onus lies on the department to prove in penalty proceedings under Income Tax Act that there was concealment of Income or deliberate furnishing of inaccurate particulars of income under Section 28(i)(c) of Income Tax Act.[31] Burden of proving that the Income had escaped assessment is on the I.T. Authorities.[32] Burden is on Revenue Authorities to show the income is liable to tax under the statute. Onus of proving that particular class of income is exempt from taxation, however, lies on assessee.[33] Burden of proof is on the assessee to show to the satisfaction of the Income Tax Officer that the income was saved from operation of sub-section (1) and sub-section (3) of Section 44-D of I.T. Act or under any other provisions of the Act.[34] Assessment made in respect of income on agricultural activities the assessee claimed that the income did not belong to the Hindu Undivided Family but to its members in their individual capacity. Then the burden rests on the department to prove that the income belonged to the Hindu Undivided Family in the absence of evidence that the property could be acquired with the income from joint family property.[35]

Burden of proof is on assessee to show that the order of the special officer and the annual valuation of the building was wrong.[36]

In any case of dispute regarding the quantum of a tax or any other financial burden between a subject and the state, the burden is on the state to show that larger quantum is leviable and not the smaller one.[37]

In a claim for allowance under secion 10(2)(xv) of Income Tax Act by the Assessee Company, burden of proof lies on the company to prove that expenditure was incurred wholly and exclusively for business of the company.[38]

Where partners of firm are residents in this country, normal presumption is that the firm is resident in taxable territory—presumption is rebuttable and can be rebutted by assessee by shwoing that control and management of affairs of the firm is situated wholly outside taxable territory. The onus to rebut initial presumption is on assessee.[39]

Burden of proving that the transaction came within the mischief of Section 10(A) is on the department.[40] Where there is a Credit entry of deposit by wife of assessee partner in account book of the firm, the source of money need not be proved by assessee and burden to prove that it is false shifts to the department.[41] It is for department to consider whether there are sufficient materials for rejecting the method of accounting.[42]

If annual value has been raised on the ground that since the last revaluation the rental value of property has increased, the burden is on corporation to lead evidence to show that there had been really such increase.[43] Where the assessee pleaded that the contractual rent should not be regarded as standard rent and therefore rateable value has not been properly fixed, onus was on the assessee.[44]

11. ASSETS

Onus is on assessee to prove whether written down value is the true value for determination of net value of assets of a business with regular account.[45]

Joint Hindu family carrying on business of money lending and purchase and sale of property had made allotment of family property towards share of a member in the partition is a capital asset in his hands. Proceeds of sale of the said property is capital receipt. Burden of proof is on the department to prove its contention that the asset was converted into stock in trade of going business.[46]

12. ATTACHMENT

The onus of proof is on the person, who alleges the non-observance of the formalities necessary for attachment.[47]

In a suit attacking the transfers of property, the burden is on the plaintiff of establishing the attacks and the onus probandi applies when judge is in doubt, he should not be blind to facts before him.[48]

13. BAD FAITH (MALA FIDES) & BONA FIDES

Burden to show that the transferee was acting in good faith is on the transferee himself and he has also to show consideration for the transfer.[49] Where the issue is whether a transaction is bona fide and genuine one or is sham and bogus, the burden of proof would not be on the party alleging it to be sham to prove its allegation unless the transaction is proved to be bona fide by the opposite party.[50] The burden of establishing mala fide is very heavy on the person who alleges it.[51] Where mala fides were alleged against a minister, it was held that the minister has to contravant the allegations in the counter affidavit and not the secretary in the department who had no personal knowledge and the mala fides were proved and the order the minister was to be set aside.[52] Onus of proving unreasonableness or unfairness of a scheme or of want of good faith is on those who object to the sanction of the scheme.[53]

Onus of proving that the impunged transactions were not entered in good faith and valuable consideration is on official receiver.[54]

Burden is on the party setting up a case of bias to prove the same.[55]

14. BAILMENT

The onus, which lies on a bailee to negative negligence on his part in case of loss of the bailed goods or articles, while in his custody, is discharged by his placing before the court all relevant or material facts under Section 106 of the Evidence Act; then the onus shifts upon the bailor (plaintiff) to show that the true inference from those fact is negligence on the part of the bailee; the true view of the decision of the Privy Council in Dwarakanth's case.[56] The burden is always on the bailee to prove that he took reasonable care of the goods entrusted to him as a man of ordinary prudence would have exercised.[57]

15. BENAMI

The law as to Benami transactions is now governed by the Benami Transactions Prohibition Act, 1988. The law in respect of benami transactions prior to the said enactment may however be useful and are dealt with hereunder.

In cases of Benami transaction, the burden of proof lies heavily on the person who claims against the tenor of the deed, that is, the alleged beneficiary to show that the ostensible vendee was a mere name lender and the property was in fact purchased only for his benefit.[58] In a suit for possession of property filed by a widow against her son she claimed that she had purchased the property under a registered sale-deed out of the money acquired by the sale of her jewellery and ornaments and other sources and the defendant son alleged that the same was purchased by his father in the name of his mother benami and the consideration was paid entirely by his father. It was held that the initial burden of proof was on the defendant son who raised the defence of benami but when the parties adduced oral and documentary evidence, the question of burden of proof became insignificant.[59]

The burden could be discharged by satisfying the well known criteria viz., in the case of Benami transactions:[60]

1. the motive for the transaction.
2. the source of purchaser money relating to the transaction.
3. the custody of the documents of title.
4. the subsequent facts of possession.[61]

In determining whether a transaction is Benami or not, all relevant factors have to taken into consideration along with surrounding circumstances, the position of the parties and their relationship to one another and the motives which would governed their actions and also their subsequent conducts.[62]

The decision on the question of Benami transaction must not rests upon suspicion but must be based on legal grounds established by legal testimony, as a person cannot be deprived of property upon mere conjecture or surmise.[63]

The onus is on the party two asserts that an endowment is nominal but not real.[64]

If all relevnt facts are before the court then the inference should be drawn from them and the question of onus becomes academic.[65]

To make an assessment on the basis that assessee was carrying on business in Benami name, the burden of proof is on department to show the Benami nature of transaction.[66]

A fraudulent transfer voidable under secion 53, T.P. Act is not the same thing as a fictitious or benami transfer. If a transaction is fictitious, it was never inteded to exist, though its object might be to defeat the rights of other people. The burden is greater in the case of a fraudulent transfer under Section 53, T.P. Act. If an intention to defraud is proved, the burden shifts to the transferee to make out good faith and consideration for the transfer.[67]

Where the plea of benami refers to a type of Sham transaction such as there was no sale at all, the party pleading benami has to establish that there was absolutely no consideration for the sale.[68] The burden of proof is heavy on a plaintiff who sues for a declaration of a document solemnly executed and registered, as a fictitious transaction. The burden becomes doubly heavy when the plaintiff seeks to set aside the order of the civil court, passed in execution proceedings, upholding the claim of a third party to a property sought to be proceeded against in execution.[69] A sale deed executed before in Sub-Registrar carries a presumption of genuineness and the burden to prove that it was benami is on the person who alleges it.[70] The onus of proof that the transaction in suit was a benami transaction was on the defendants when it was his case that the sale deed was taken benami in the name of the plaintiff by him with a view of preventing any trouble from Income Tax Department.[71] In a suit filed by the decree-holder under Order XXI, R. 63 of the Civil Procedure Code alleging that the claimant was the *Benami*dar of the judgment debtor, the onus to prove benami lies in plaintiff.[72]

(a) Husband and Wife.—The Privy Council in Guran Ditta v. Ram Ditta[73] observed "The deposit by a Hindu of his money in a bank in the joint names of himself and his wife and on terms that it is payable to either as survivor does not on his death constitute a gift by him to his wife. There is a resulting trust in his favour in the absence of proof of a contrary intention, there being in India no presumption of an intended advancement in favour of a wife.[74] Where there was no explanation for the transaction the law in England presumes an intention to benefit the wife or child. But in India no such presumption or rule exists.[75] In the last case in[76] the wife pleaded that the transaction in her favour was in persuance of an ante-nuptial arrangement, the plea was rejected as the agreement was not proved and it was held that the husband is the real onwer of the property.

Deposit of money in wife's name does not amount to a gift. It is a resulting trust. If anybody says it was a gift he must prove it.[77]

In a suit by vendee for specific performance of agreement by husband to sell land belonging to wife, the burden of proving that husband had implied authority of wife to sell her land is upon plaintiff and not upon subsequent transferee from wife herself.[78]

The ordinary rule that the onus is on the person to prove that the property belonged to somebody other than the person in whom the title deed stands is not shifted even if the property stands in the name of a married woman.[79]

Mere proof that the consideration was paid not by the wife but by the husband is not sufficient to establish the claim of benami.[80]

(b) Benami (Father and Son).—Where the property is purchased by the father in the name of his son and the latter claims it as his own by alleging that father intended to make a gift of the property to him, the onus rests upon him to establish such a gift as the presumption therefore is to favour of the transaction being benami.[81]

The fact that the donor had debts at the time of gift is not conclusive to show that the gift was a Benami transaction.[82]

(c) Benami's (other illustrations).—The actual lender of money is entitled to sue upon on a mortgage though the mortgage deed is executed in favour of another.[83]

There is nothing in law of partnership to prevent the plaintiff from making a case that apart from having a share in his own name he was holding a further share in the partnership in the benami of his son.[84]

The burden is on income tax department to prove that what was apparent from the registered partnership deed was not real and that it was benami.[85]

In a suit for pre-emption, onus probandi of proving that pre-emptor is acting benami for vendee is on the person making the allegation.[86]

16. BIRTH, DEATH AND AGE

Where the allegation as to age of the plaintiff made in a plaint is denied by the defendants, it is for the plaintiff to establish the correctness of the facts alleged as to age in the plaint and he must discharge the burden by adducing necessary proof.[87]

Where the question for determination is whether death was caused by accident or design, the initial presumption must in favour of death by innocent cause. This presumption may be dislodged by showing facts and circumstances which may be sufficient to nullify the probative value of the presumption.[88] Party asserting survival has to prove it like any other fact. There is no presumption of it founded on age, sex or other factor and also no presumption of death at the same time.[89] Under Section 21 Hindu Succession Act, the statutory presumption is the death of several persons by same calamity at same time that the presumption as to survivorship is according to seniority, the younger being presumed to have survived the older and this presumption is rebuttable.[90]

17. CANCELLATION OF SALE DEED

Where in a suit for cancellation of the sale deed and for possession filed on default by his purchaser to pay the balance of the purchase money as agreed upon, a compromise decree was passed whereby the defendants agreed to pay the balance of the purchase money by instalments and in case of default of any one instalment the suit was to be decreed and such default having been made the plaintiff applied for execution of the decree. It was held that it was for the defendants to prove that the fault was not theirs.[91]

18. CARRIERS

In a suit for damages to goods entrusted for carriage by defendant's ship, defendant's plea was one of accident and then it is for him to prove the perils of sea.[1]

19. CASTE

If a Hindu belonging to Adi-dravida caste coverted to Christianity ceases to belong to Adi-dravida caste, then the burden lies on him to prove that on conversion he again became member of Adi-dravida caste.[2] The person claims to belong to particular socially and educationally backward class, must establish conclusively that he belongs to that caste.[3] Party alleging reversion to Hindu religion has to prove his assertion.[4]

20. VICARIOUS LIABILITY

In the case of vicarious liability of State for the acts of its employees, the burden of proving existence of circumstances to claim immunity lies on State and its employees.[5]

21. COMPROMISE

Burden is on plaintiff to establish that the compromise decree in earlier suit is not binding upon him being mala fide and tainted with fraud and collusion.[6]

22. CONSIDERATION

If the company's property was sold to another company and the payment of consideration was in shares, then the burden of proving consideration for sale was less than what is purported to be was on the transferor company.[7]

In a suit for price of coal, the plaintiff alleged that price was to be paid by weight but the defendant alleged the payment was to be made by measurement. When no satisfactory evidence could be adduced by both the parties, it was held that it was for plaintiff to prove the claim.[8]

The onus of proof on the question whether there was consideration of whether full consideration as stated in the document in fact passed is wholly on the defendant and it is not for the plaintiff to prove affirmatively.[9] The burden lay on the defendant to substantiate his denial of the receipt of consideration in the face of the document itself, admitting his indebtedness to the plaintiff in clear terms.[10] When the execution of the document was admitted by the defendant or proved, it is he to prove affirmatively about the failure or partial failure of the consideration.[11]

Where plaintiff wants to set up a different form of consideration other than the recitals in the pronote, he has to prove the same; though the defendant denies consideration under the pronote.[12]

When Mortgagor admitting execution but pleading want of consideration then burden to prove want of consideration is squarely on shoulders of mortgagor.[13] Burden of proving that no consideration passed under a promote is on A who denies it. In the case of an admission by A in another deed that he had received the amount under a promissory note, the burden is on A to prove that the admission was made under a mistake and is not true.[14] When there is an admission in the document between the parties of passing of the consideration, burden lies on the party making the admission to explain the admission and the admissions can be taken into consideration in assessing the value of the evidence produced by the parties.[15]

It was held that when the court disbelieved the defendant's plea as to the circumstances under which the pronote was executed without consideration and also disbelieved the plaintiff's story, still the presumption under Section 118 of the Negotiable Instruments Act would operate and the suit is entitled to be decreed.

However in G. Vasu v. Syed Yaseen Sifuddin[16] following the view expressed by WANCHOO C.J. in[17] JAGANATHRAO J. delivering the judgment of the Full Bench held that on a consideration of the expression "until the contrary is proved" in Section 118(a) Negotiable Instruments Act and the expressions "proved" "disproved" and "not proved" and "shall presume" in Sections 3 and 4 of the Evidence Act and the provisions relating to burden of proof contained in Sections 101 to 104 of the Evidence Act, that while dealing with the question as to whether the contrary, namely the absence of consideration, has been proved by the defendant the Court shall have to consider not only whether, it believes that consideration does not exist, but also whether it considers the non-existence of consideration so probable that a reasonable man ought, under the circumstances of the particular case, to act upon the supposition that the consideration does not exist. It was further held following the view of the Supreme Court in Kundanlal v. Custodian Evacuee Property[18], that the legal burden initially rested on the plaintiff but where the execution of the pronote is admitted, the evidential burden is initially shifted to the defendant who can adduce acceptable evidence or may also rely upon circumstantial evidence or may rely on presumptions contained in Section 114 or other provisions of the Evidence Act, then the burden shifts again to the plaintiff as the presumption under Section 118 Negotiable Instruments Act can be rebutted by the presumption under Section 114 of the Evidence Act[19]; when the burden shifts to the plaintiff and the legal burden of the plaintiff is revived to prove that the pronote is supported by consideration at that stage the presumption of law covered in Section 118 disappears and no longer subsists.[20]

Where execution of a mortgage deed has been proved as required by law, an acknowledgment contained therein of receipt of consideration is evidence not only as against the mortgagor but also as against a purchaser from the mortgagor or an auction purchaser at a sale in execution of money decree. And if such a purchaser pleads want of consideration then the burden lies on him to prove it.[21]

In a suit by the creditor for enforcing pious obligation of sons to pay their father's debt by proceeding against interest of the sons in ancestral property if they deny the factum of debt the creditor must prove that there was a real debt in existance. Admission made by father in the deed executed by him alone, does not have the same probative value against sons that it has against executants. Consideration will not be presumed but will have to be proved against sons, if disputed.[22]

Onus rests on plaintiff to prove both the fact of execution and passing of consideration.[23]

It is open to minor heir of a deceased mortgagor, to rebut the presumption as to receipt of consideration arising from proof of the execution of the mortgage by the deceased mortgagor by showing that the admission of receipt of consideration cannot be safely acted upon.[24]

When assignor admitted receipt of consideration, then burden is on him to show that he did not as a matter of fact receive it.[25]

Where a plaintiff's case with reference to a bond which did not describe the consideration, is that the consideration was a previous account due, it is not necessary for him to produce documentary proof of consideration. The proof of the bond would be enough.[26]

23. CONSTITUTIONAL VALIDITY

Under Article 13 of the Constitution of India, the socio-economic bio-data of challenged legislation must be produced by litigants explaining how, why and why not of each clause.[27]

Persons who attack any provision as ultra vires the Constitution have to establish their contention.[28] The burden of proving that a particular reservation offends Art. 16(1) of the Constitution of India, is on the person who assails the reservation.[29] If the petitioner objected for transfer of village 'C' to Pakistan under part relating to Beruban Union No. 12 in Sch. 2, Constitution (9th Amendment) Act, 1960 the onus lies on him to show that the attempt made by the Govt. to transfer his village is illegal and unconstitutional.[30] Under Article 14, Constitution of India, the burden is on the person challenging the legislation as discriminating.[31] Unless classification of employees for purposes of appointment or promotion is prima facie unjust, onus lies on the party attacking classification to show that it is unreasonable and violative of Article 16 of Constitution.[32] The burden is on the person who impeaches the law as violative of the constitutional guarantee.[33] Burden of proving invalidity of Rules lies on person who challenges their validity.[34]

24. REASONABLE RESTRICTION

Onus to prove the reasonableness of restrictions imposed under Art. 19(1)(g) is on the state or the authority concerned.[35]

25. CONTRACT

In the case of plea by insurance company that there was breach of term of policy in that the driver of insured vehicle did not have valid licence the burden to prove is on company.

Burden to prove absence of privity of contract is on defendant.[36] See Contract Act (1872), S. 2.

In a contract made with plaintiff by A and at plaintiff's request plaintiff's name was deleted and H's name was submitted and a fresh contract made in H's name by A. Onus of proving that plaintiff was liable on contract inspite of altered term was on A.[37] Where the contract was purported to be signed by the Dy Secretary who was ostensibly authorised to sign contracts on behalf of the Government, if the Government denied such authority, then the burden of proof is on them to show that the person who actually executed the contract was not duly authorised to execute the said contraction behalf of the Government.[38] Party making allegation that the contract is conditional must prove the condition in contract.[39]

In a suit for damages for breach of contract burden of proving that the frustration is self induced is on the plaintiff.[40]

Where the purchaser under a contract for the sale of immovable property claims under S. 27(b) of the Specific Relief Act, 1877, a decree for specific performance against a person claiming title from the vendor under a registered sale-deed executed after the contract, the onus is upon the defendant to prove that he is a bona fide purchaser for value without notice of the earlier contract so as to bring himself within the exception provided by the above section. Himatlal v. Vasudev[41] and other decisions in India to the above effect, were approved.[42]

Where agreement is challenged as being a restraint of trade, the onus of showing the restrictions were reasonably necessary to his interest is on the party supporting the contract.[43]

In a suit for specific performance of agreement burden of proving is on the defendant alleging abandonment of contract by plaintiff.[44]

If plaintiff is buyer, he must allege and prove that he was ready and willing to pay for the goods.[45] It is for plaintiff to show that she had not forfeited her right of reconveyance even though she did not make the offer within time.[46] Onus of proof is on plaintiff to show that defendant committed the breach by not disclosing material defect. Mere averment in the plaint is not evidence.[47]

The ordinary rule regarding the onus, incumbent on the plaintiff, has really no application to cases where the true boundary is to be ascertained.[48]

Onus of proving a contract to be wagering one is on the party alleging it.[49] Burden of proving that suit contract was illegal as prohibited by law lies heavily on defendant who takes that defence.[50] Burden of proving allegation that share in managing agency was offered as bribe and was against public policy is on those who allege it. They are not required to prove it beyond reasonable doubt as in a criminal case.[51]

26. CUSTOM

If a party pleads in specific terms as to what is the custom that he is relying, he must prove that custom.[52]

The general custom of Punjab is that a daughter excludes collaterals in succession to self-acquired property of her father. Therefore initial onus, is on the collaterals to show that the general custom has been varied by a special custom excluding daughters.[53] Onus of proof is upon party who sets up a custom at variance with general law.[54] Burden of proof is on person who alleges it to show that there is a family custom of excluding the females from taking the property as heirs.[55]

Here a Hindu belonging to Adi-Dravida Caste is converted to Christianity burden lies on him to prove that on reconversion he again became member of Adi-Dravida Caste.[56] Burden of proving that in the matter of succession Hindu Law applies to Mewatis would be upon person alleging it.[57]

Burden of proof of a community custom is much heavier than that of a family or local custom. It would require examples spread throughout India and the number must necessarily be correspondingly. large.[58]

27. DAMAGES

In a suit for compensation against the defendant for extracting coal from underground within area belonging to the plaintiffs, the onus is always on the plaintiffs to establish firstly that the land alleged to be encroached upon belongs to them, secondly, there was encroachment of the land and thirdly the encroachment was done by the defendants.[59]

In a suit for damages it is for the plaintiff to adduce reliable evidence to show what damage he had suffered.[60] In a suit for damages for non-delivery of goods, the seller has to prove that the booking of the goods became impossible to make delivery of goods in terms of the contract.[61] In a suit to recover value of car on the allegation that it was lost in transit the burden of proving it was on plaintiff/consignor.[62]

Where plaint was filed on a definite averment that the storing agent did not deliver certain goods and claimed a specific amount towards their value burden lies on the plaintiff to prove his case.[63] Loss of pecuniary benefit due to death of deceased and to sustain action under Fatal Accidents Act, the plaintiff has to prove reasonable expectation of pecuniary advantage.[64] The value of goods and extent of damage have to be proved by the claimant because the railway certificate is not the final thing.[65] In a class for compensation under Section 110(A) of the M.V. Act, it is for the claimants to adduce evidence and show what the income of the deceased was and what pecuniary loss they had suffered by the death. Once they adduce such evidence, it is then for the opposite party to adduce evidence to show the amount to be deducted from the pecuniary loss sustained by the clamants.[66]

In a suit by the employee for breach of contract of employment and liability for payment of salary by way of damages, the burden to prove existence of mitigating circumstances is on the employer.[67]

In a claim for damages under Section 110-B of Motor Vehicles Act, onus of proof normally is on plaintiff. Where facts and circumstances made out a clear case of negligence, it is for defence to prove that he was not negligent.[68]

An insurance company pleaded breach of a term of the policy in that the driver did not have a valid licence, but produced no evidence of the lack of licence. The Company's case failed[69] Where there was no direct evidence to prove that a person purchased ticket and boarded a train or that he died in the accident, the claim for compensation failed.[70]

Genera damages need not specifically be proved.[71]

28. DECLARATORY SUITS

Where in a suit, the plaintiffs admit that the defendant is in possession of the suit properties but they assert that he is there as mutawalli and that his possession is on behalf of the Sunni Muhammadan Community and for that reason the plaintiffs say that a declaratory suit will lie and that they need not sue for possession, then the burden lies on the plaintiffs to prove their claim.[72] In a suit by the creditors for declaration that the transfer of property made by the debtor was fradulent and as such was not binding on them, the onus to prove want of good faith in the transferee is on the creditors who impugn the transaction. But where fraud on the part of transferer is established, the burden of proving that he is a transferee in good faith fell within the exception.[73] Where in a suit for declaration of title to certain property, the plaintiff relies on a gift deed in her favour executed by her husband in respect of his self-acquired property, and if the defendant alleged that it is an ancestral property of Hindu Joint Family, then the main burden will be on the plaintiff to prove that the property is self-acquired property of her husband.[74] When the plaintiff seeks a declaration to the effect that he is not liable under the Employee's Provident Fund Act and seeks a permanent injunction restraining the department from enforcing the provisions of the Act though no positive evidence has been adduced by the department, as the reliefs which the plaintiff claims are equitable reliefs, the initial burden of proving that he is entitled to these equitable reliefs is upon the plaintiff. It may be that very slighest evidence may be sufficient to satisfy the court that the burden has been discharged.[75] In a suit for declaration of title, the plaintiff must prove his title and he cannot take advantage of the weakness of the defendant.[76]

29. DISCHARGE AND PAYMENT

Accused admitted that he received money but contented that he handed it over to J, who was incharge of office. It was held that the burden of proof was on him to show what he had done with money and that when he failed to discharge that burden, the conviction has to be upheld.[77] When once a mortgage has been admitted, the onus is on the mortgagee to show that the mortgage has been extinguished by subsequent sale.[78]

Normally, the debtor must show agreement that payment towards interest would be appropriated towards principal under Order XXI, Rule 1, C.P.C.[79] Burden is on judgment-debtor to prove the plea of discharge under Section 30 Bengal Money Lenders Act.[80] Payment by a judgment-debtor to a partner of a decree-holder firm binds all the partners and, if any partner disputes the payment, the burden is upon him to prove the special circumstances under which it does not bind him.[81]

In a suit on a bond, the plaintiff accounted for the non-production of the bond, by alleging that the defendant had stolen it. The defendant admitted the execution of the bond, but alleged he had paid it. It was held that the defendant was bound to begin and prove payment, either by the production of the bond or other evidence or by both.[82]

Suit based on promissory note was contested by the defendant on the ground that he had repaid the amount. If he claims that he had received the amount in settlement of previous debt, then the burden of proof is on him to prove the previous debt.[83]

The mere fact that the promissory note is found to be in the possession of the plaintiffs is not sufficient for holding that the liability under it has not been discharged.[84]

30. DISCIPLINARY PROCEEDINGS

In a disciplinary or departmental inquiry, the question of burden of proof depends upon the nature of charges and the nature of explanation put forward by the delinquent officer and does not always lie on the department. Where loans were disbursed to ineligible persons on the basis of wrong notings of an officer, the burden to establish his case was on the officer.[85]

31. DOMICILE AND CITIZENSHIP

In a prosecution under Section 14, Foreigners' Act, the accused pleaded that he was domiciled in India and was residing in India when the Constitution of India came into force, the burden is upon him and he should be given a chance to prove it.[86]

Onus to prove loss of citizenship is on party seeking to deprive a person of his citizenship right.[87]

Onus lies upon person claiming the citizenship.[88]

The onus of proving that a domicile has been chosen in substitution for the domicile of origin is upon those who assert that the domicile of origin has been lost.[89]

32. EASEMENTS

Exercise of a right in assertion of an easementary right is one of the essential ingredients which a claimant has to establish.[90]

In law the owner of every open space is entitled to build over it unless his action in building interferes with as easementary right already acquired.[91]

33. EJECTMENT

In any action by an inamdar to evict his tenants and by a zamindar prior to the enactment of the Madras Estates Land Act, 1908 to evict his raiyats from their holdings the burden was on the plaintiff to make out the right to evict by proving that the grant included both the melvaram and the kudivaram interests or that the holders of land or their predecessors were let into possession by the inamdar or the zamindar under a terminable lease.[1]

A plaintiff suing for ejectment can only succeed on the strength of his own title. There is no obligation on the defendant to prove possible defects in that title.[2]

In a suit for ejectment it is for the plaintiff to prove his title and the Court is not concerned with the weakness of the title of the defendant. The defendant may be a trespasser, but as a defendant in possession, he is entitled to ask the plaintiff to prove strictly his title.[3] The ground of eviction that the tenant had impaired materially the value of the building, has got to be proved by the landlord.[4] However, if certain acts were proved or admitted to have been committed by the tenant, they speak for themselves.[5]

The burden lies upon the plaintiff to prove that he was in possession within 12 years of the suit.[6]

Agricultural lease granted by the mortgagee in possession will be binding on mortgagor even though the mortgage has been redeemed provided that it is such that a prudent owner of property would enter into, in the ordinary course of management. This being in the nature of an exception, it is for the person who claims benefit thereon to strictly establish it.[7]

34. ELECTION CASES

Burden to prove invalidity of votes is on the petitioner.[8] The burden of proving that the election is liable to be set aside for corrupt practice is heavily on the applicant, though the petitioner need not prove the allegations beyond all reasonable doubt as in a criminal prosecution.[9] It cannot be said that the mere fact that the wasted votes are greater than the margin of votes between returned candidates and the candidate securing the next highest number of votes must lead to the necessary inference that the result of the election has been materially affected. That is a matter which has to be proved and the onus of proving it lies upon the election petitioner.[10]

Where a nomination paper has been improperly rejected there is a strong presumption that the result of the election has been materially affected and the burden is on the person seeking to uphold the election to prove the contrary.[11]

The burden is on the party challenging declaration alleging malpractices and such other acts to prove those allegations. Further, unless he proves that had it not been for the malpractices, he would have secured more votes, but he would not succeed and it could then be said that the result of the election was not materially affected. But if challenge is not on any malpractices but non-compliance with any provisions of the Act and if the petitioner succeeds in establishing the non-compliance, the declaration of the returning officer that the respondent is elected for the general seat would naturally amount to materially affecting the result which deprives the petitioner from being declared elected.[12] Where the question was of proving the corrupt practice of under influence under the Representation of the People Act, 1951, the Supreme Court said.[13] "There is no ritualistic formula nor a cut and dried test to lay down as to how a charge of undue influence can be proved but if all the circumstances taken together lead to the irresistible inference that the voters were pressurised, threatened or assaulted at the instance of either candidate, they should be sufficient to vitiate the election. While insisting on standard of strict proof, the Court should not extend or stretch this doctrine to such an extent as to make it well-nigh impossible to prove an allegation of corrupt practice. Such an approach would defeat and fraustrate the very laudable and sacrosanct object of the Act maintaining purity of the electoral process".

The onus to show that a statement of fact which was published by a candidate or his agent or by any other person with the consent of the candidate, affecting his personal character or conduct is on the election petitioner under Section 123(4), Representation of People Act.[14]

In challenging that the candidate does not belong to a particular scheduled caste is on the petitioner to show to which particular caste the candidate belongs.[15]

Where election was challenged on the ground that the elected candidate was below 25 years of age on the date of filing the nomination paper and thus disqualified under Article 137 of Constitution of India, the burden to prove that the age was below 25 years on relevant date is on election petitioner.[16] Where a petitioner challenged the election by accepting improper nomination or by refusal of a nomination, the onus lies upon the petitioner.[17] Question whether poster containing allegations against character of appellant, candidate at election, was distributed by respondent, (successful candidate) the burden is on appellant to prove that such distribution took place at various meetings.[18]

35. EXECUTION OF DOCUMENT

In the case of a suit on a bond when execution and consideration are both denied by the defendant, the primary burden to prove execution as well as consideration is on the plaintiff.[19]

In a suit under Orders XXI, R. 63 of C.P.C. 1908, (Now Rule 58(5)), the burden of proof is heavy on the plaintiff suing for declaration that the document on which the order of the executing court was passed was a sham & fictitious one.[20] There is presumption in favour of plaintiff that a suit bond bearing signature of defendant and duly attested and registered had been validity executed. If defendant wants to challenge its genuineness or validity, it is he who has to establish his contention.[21] When a signature or thumb impression in a document is admitted by a person to be his and it purports to be in token of the execution of the document by him then a presumption rises that he must have executed it.[22]

Where there is no reason forthcoming why a different ink has been used for the purpose of the signatures of the attesting witnesses from the ink used for the body of the document and the thumb impression on the deed, the execution of the document is suspicious.[23]

Where the defendent admits his signature on a voucher that an amount was advanced by way of loan the burden is on him to prove that he signed on a blank paper.[24] Where the defendant admitted only that he put his signature on a blank paper which he alleged had possibly been utilised for fabricating document, the onus of proving due execution must be thrown on the plaintiff.[25] Initial onus on plaintiff is not discharged by proving identity of thumb impression. It must be further proved that the thumb impression was given on the document after it had been written out and completed.[26]

A heavy burden is laid on the defendant to prove that plaintiff had not only agreed to sell out but she knew what was being written when the plaintiff is admittedly blind, and her signature on the sale deed cannot have any force[27] and also when an old lady having no proper vision contended that she wanted to execute only a power of attorney and not a settlement deed.[28] Where a person ignorant of English affixed his mark to a document written in English, the onus to prove that the document was properly explained and interpreted to him so as to make him understand its true import is on the party relying on the document.[29] 'A' filed a suit to evict 'B' from the suit land on ground that 'B' was a licencee, relying on letter in Urdu and signed by 'B' in Mundi. Admission of the signature by 'B' who was an illitrate and did not know Urdu, was held not amount to admission of document. Burden was on 'A' to prove that 'B' was a licencee and the document was properly explained to him.[30] Onus to prove that the document was properly explained and interpreted to an illiterate person affixing his mark so as to make him understand its true import is on the party relying on the document.[31] Where a woman, illiterate and unaware of the contents of a document executed a sale deed in favour of a close relative under the impression, it was a mortgage, it was held that this was a case of non est factum and the burden lay upon the vendee to show the plaintiff was fully aware of the nature of the document.[32]

The Supreme Court observed : "The burden of proof was always upon the person who sought to sustain a transaction entered into with a pardanashin lady to establish that the document was executed by her after clearly understanding the nature of the transaction. It had to be established not only that it was her physical act but also that it was her mental act. The burden could be discharged not only by proving that the document was explained to her and that she understood it, but also by other evidence, direct and circumstantial."[33] Where in a mortgage deed executed by Pardanashin lady which was read out and sufficiently explained to her and the language of deed was quite clear and intelligible to her, in such cases, the proof of independent advice is not necessary.[34] Where the court losing sight of the right of onus thrown upon persons claiming under an instrument executed by a pardanashin woman comes to a conclusion that she executed the deed knowingly, largely on circumstantial evidence which is quite consistent with the possibility that the woman did not in fact understand the nature of the deed that she was executing, the finding is vitiated.[35]

Where a sale deed contains an admission made by one of the parties, and that party challenges the sale deed then the onus to prove falsity of contents of deed is on that party only.[36]

Where contention was that the document was a sale deed, but in actual fact, it was intended by the parties only to be a mortgage. The burden is on the party who alleges the same.[37]

36. SIGNATURE ON BLANK PAPER

In case the defendant says that he put his signature on a blank paper but, if the evidence adduced by the plaintiff is found to be reliable and he is able to discharge his burden sufficiently, then the onus will shift to the defendant to show that he had not executed the document.[38]

Where the defendant admitted only that he put his signature on a blank paper which he alleged had possibly been utilised for fabricating document, the onus of proving due execution must be thrown on the plaintiff.[39]

37. FRAUD

Fraud like any other charges of criminal offence whether made in Civil or Criminal Proceedings, must be established beyond reasonable doubt, as no fraud cannot be based on suspicion and conjecture.[40]

Where the conveyance is brought about by fraud practised by vendor or where there is any express agreement between parties for payment of compensation for any defect or deficiency in property conveyed, or where there is any express or implied warranty, the burden is on plaintiff to make out the case of fraud on the part of the defendant.[41] The burden of proving that a purchase has been made by a person, as an agent for the plaintiff and that the former fraudulently made the purchase in his own name and concealed the fact from the plaintiff is entirely on the agent.[42]

A debtor transferred his property. Creditors alleged and proved it to be a fraudulent transfer. The burden was now on him to show that the transfer was within any of the exceptions.[43]

Where A alleges that a deed executed by him is vitiated by misrepresentation. The onus is upon A to establish plea of misrepresentation.[44]

Where there was an innocent on insignificant misstatement of the value of an article sent by insured post and the article is lost, it is for the insurer to lead evidence that the market value of the article was higher as the burden is on the insurer to show than the policy is no longer subsisting or that there has been such a condition which relieves the insurer from liability.[45] Insurer alleging fraud and misrepresentation in procuring re-instatement or revival of policy, has to establish the same and has also to show that the misrepresentation was material and that the insured knew of the falsity of the statement.[46]

Where cheques were dishonoured burden lay upon those issuing them to show that they were issued by mistake.[47]

38. GRANT

The grant being clearly of a named village, it was an 'Estate', within the meaning of Section 3(2)(d) of Madras Act (1 of 1908). Burden to prove that the village was not an "Estate" is on the party claiming accordingly.[48] Burden lies on the party contending that land is not estate to prove that minor inams were granted subsequent to inam grant of named village.[49] Where the petitioners claimed re-grant of watan land on the ground that they were tenants in possession, burden was on them to establish that they were authorised holders of the said land.[50]

39. HINDU JOINT FAMILY

Burden of proof that any particular property is joint family property is in the first instance upon the person who claims it as coparcenary property. It is only after possession of adequate nucleus is shown that the onus shifts on to person who claims property as self-acquired without any aid from the family estate.[51]

A Hindu son governed by the Mistakashara Law is bound to pay the debts of his father even if they are not incurred for purpose of legal necessity or for benefit to the estate, provided the debts are not argavahasika or illegal, the burden of proving that there is a debt and that the debt is aryavahrika or illegal was before the son.[52]

In an alienation by a Karta, proof of a legal necessity is on the alienee.[53] Where in a Joint Hindu Family the widowed mother was the 'karta' and her sons claimed execution of sale in their favour by their mother, the 'karta' due to legal necessity, the burden of proving the legal necessity was on the alienees.[54] Where the father alienated some joint family property and the son assailed the alienation, it was for the son to prove the grounds of his assailment that the alienation was tainted with illegality and immorality of which the purchasers had previous knowledge. The father was not required to show that it was made for the legal necessity or for the family benefit.[55]

Where manager of a Hindu family admitted that family possessed certain unaccounted cash, the burden of proving that division of that amount was in fact made, lies on him.[56]

Onus is on him who asserts that an item held by a member is joint family property, to prove it.[57] Where one party pleaded that a certain disputed property of the joint family was purchased from the separate income of their father, onus was on them to prove.[58]

There is no onus in law on a Hundu family to show that certain items of deposits standing in the names of different members of the family do not belong to it.[59]

Whether properties acquired by widow out of savings from income from her husband's estate form an accretion to her widow's estate or constitute her stridhan must be determined according to the intention of the widow in dealing with those properties. Person alleging accretions must show that the property was acquired by the widow with that intention.[60] Where the defendant alleged that the suit property was purchased by the plaintiff from the joint family funds, burden was on him to prove his allegation.[61]

If a set of persons carries on business as a firm, it is for them to show that the firm is a joint family firm.[62]

The burden of proof is on the person who sets up partition. There is no presumption where one person separates whether the rest continue joint or separate[63] but in case of partition by a registered deed, burden to prove that the partition was not true and valid, lies upon the party, challenging the partition.[64]

Allegation by members that the joint family had separated must be proved by them. This can be proved by evidence of conduct subsequent to the material date.[65]

Where the father and the sons, not a Joint Hindu Family, carried on business in partnership and property was purchased in the name of the eldest son, presumption would be that it was the property of the son in whose name the purchase was made. If the other partner claims that the purchase was for the benefit of all, burden would be on him to prove it[66] and not on the party in whose name the sale-deed was executed to prove that he had acquired the said property by his own money or that he had a separate income at the relevant time.[67]

40. JURISDICTION

Party seeking to oust jurisdiction of Civil Courts must establish its right to do so.[68]

41. LANDLORD AND TENANT

Where there is no dispute as to indentity of the subject let, but the tenant denies that he had ever got possession of the subject, it is for the landlord to prove that he had discharged his obligation to put the tenant in possession before he can enforce the tenant's obligation to pay rent.[69] Where there was a dispute of ownership of a building erected allegedly by the tenant on the leased land and the tenant specifically denied that the said building was also leased, it was for the landlady to establish his tenancy to the said building.[70]In a suit for eviction against a sub-tenant, the tenant was neither contesting nor did he appear as a witness and the landlord also did not appear but produced witnesses on his behalf and relied on a document, a sulehnama, entered into between the tenant and the landlord which being not proved, could not be relied upon. Onus squarely lay on the landlord to prove the sub-tenancy.[71]

If it is alleged that tenancy is at will according to established custom, the onus is on him to prove the custom.[72] Where the person claiming to be a tenant produced a certified copy of the admission of his tenancy given by the landlord, the burden was on the landlord to disprove the admission.[73] Once sub-tenancy is proved, the burden would be on the tenant to prove that the parting with possession—both legal and physical—by him in favour of the sub-tenant was without any valid consideration.[74]

42. LEGITIMACY

If a person claimed to be a preferential heir to the estate of the deceased, over another person, on the ground that the later was illegitimate, the former must adduce "sufficient general evidence" of illegitimacy so as to throw the onus on the latter of proving his legitimacy.[75]

When a man and a woman lived together as husband and wife for sufficiently long time and were treated as husband and wife by friends, relatives and neighbours there is always a presumption in favour of their marriage. If children are born to such a couple, there is a further presumption in favour of their legitimacy.[76]

The standard of proof required for proving non-access between the husband and wife during the subsistence of their marriage must at least be of a degree between the proof beyond reasonable doubt and the test of preponderance of probability.[77]

43. LIMITATION

In an application to set aside an ex parte decree, it is for the applicant to show that the application was within 30 days from his knowledge of the decree and hence was within limitation.[78]

The plaintiff has to prove the acknowledgement of debt by the defendant to save[79] limitation.

Burden of proof is on person seeking to get the delay condoned to establish sufficient cause for the delay.[80]

To defeat the plaintiff's claim to sue within three years from the date of knowledge of a fact, the defendant has to prove that plaintiff had knowledge of the fact more than three years back prior to filing of the suit.[81]

The burden to bring the case under Section 14, Limitation Act is on plaintiff.[82] Where the plaintiffs were conscious of the delay in filing the suit, onus was on them to show that their suit was within time.[83] It is incumbent on the plaintiff to show in the first instance how the suit brought by them was within time.[84]

Burden of proving that the plaintiff is within time is on plaintiff. In some cases evidence may reach a point at which onus to prove the suit out of time rests upon the defendant. Regard must always be had of the party in whose knowledge the relevant facts may appear.[85]

44. DESERTION—MATRIMONIAL

In divorce proceedings the plaintiff must prove the offence of desertion, like any other matrimonial offence beyond all reasonable doubt.[86]

The burden of proof is on the person who alleges adultery. The mere fact that some male relation writes improper letters to a married woman does not necessarily prove that there was illicit relationship between the writer of the letters and the married woman who received them.[87]

45. MAINTENANCE

In maintenance proceedings the only consequence of the defendant's refusal to give blood for testing, will be that it will be taken into consideration alongwith other evidence in evaluating the evidence against him.[88]

46. INTENTION, KNOWLEDGE AND MENS REA

It is for the prosecution to prove the due publication or that the accused had knowledge. This cannot be inferred from the mere conduct of the accused.[89]

47. MALICIOUS PROSECUTION

It is well-settled that in an action for malicious prosecution, the onus of establishing absence of reasonable and probable cause in launching the criminal prosecution against the plaintiff by the defendant lies in the first instance on the plaintiff.[90]

48. MORTGAGE

Where a mortgage deed contains a recital that a mortgage money was given as a loan to the mortgagor and that he received the amount, the burden is on the mortgagor to prove that no consideration was in fact paid and merely because of some discrepancies in the evidence of mortgagee's witness the burden will not be deemed to be discharged.[91]

In a suit for declaration of title based on a chora othi (an irredeemable mortgage amounting to sale), it is for the plaintiffs to prove when the suit mortgage was executed and also that the acknowledgement relied upon by them is in respect of that mortgage and that it has been made within the period of limitation.[92]

When the plaintiff has estblished a prima facie case of negligence, the burden shifts to the owner of the vessel under way to prove that they were not at fault.[93]

When a house leased to defendant was destroyed by fire, the onus of proving negligence is on plaintiff landlord. Doctrine of res ipsa loquitur does not apply.[94]

The burden of proving contributory negligence is on the defendant.[95]

In an action based on negligence. The maxim res ipsa loquitur does not alter the rule that the onus to prove negligence rests on the claimant. The defendant may rebut the inference by proving the specific cause of accident[96] but where the vehicle suddenly went off the road, overturned and killed the victim, the burden of proving no negligence in such cases shifts to the other party/the driver.[97] Where the cause of accident was pleaded to be mechanical failure of the vehicle, burden was on its owner to prove that all necessary care and caution was taken to keep the vehicle in road-worthy condition[1] and in a death caused by electrocution by coming into contact of a live wire snapped from a pole, the burden to prove the plea that the wire was snapped due to heavy rains and there was no negligence on their part, was on the Electricity Board.[2]

In a suit for redemption, the plaintiff should establish that the alleged mortgage was subsisting and was not extinguished.[3]

Failure to perform emergency operation and death of patient on account of such failure amounts to negligence on the part of surgeon. If the surgeon advances a plea that the patient did not give his consent for the surgery or the course of treatment advised by him, the burden is on him to prove that the non-performance of surgery or the non-administration of the treatment, was on account of the refusal of the patient to give consent thereto.[4]

50. NOTICE

It is the established law that, where a sale or a decree is impeached on the ground of non-service or fradulent suppression of notices, the initial onus is on the person who alleges service, that is to say, on the defendant to the action who tries to maintain the impugned sale.[5] The burden of proving the service of notice of award to the claimant under the Land Acquisition Act, either actually or constructively, is on the state.[6]

51. PARTNERSHIP

The question whether a person dealing with a firm has notice of the dissolution of the firm by the retirement of one of partners from it, is one of fact and the onus of proving that fact is on such partner.[7]

52. SUCCESSION

Whenever a person claims title to the estate of another by inheritance or succession, it is imperative for him to prove not only that he was related in some way or other with the last male holder of the estate but also that under the law of succession governing the parties he was the only heir entitled to succeed to the estate at the material time. In other words, he must prove not only that he was related in particular manner but also that no nearer heir was in existence.[8]

Under Section 27, Sonthal, Parganas Settlement Regulation heavily laid down prohibition against transfer of raiyats land. The burden lies on the person setting up invalidity of transfer to show it was raiyati land.[9]

53. TRUST AND TRUSTEE

The plaintiffs brought the suit claiming to be trustees and praying for a declaration of their own title as trustees and for a declaration that the defendants were not trustees and for possession of the trust properties and other incidential reliefs. It was found as a fact that the meeting at which the plaintiff were elected trustees had not been held on due notice to all churches interested and was consequently not a valid meeting. It was held that in a suit of this description if the plaintiffs were to succeed they must do so on the strength of their own title.[10]

Where the discoverable origins of property show it to be trust property the onus of establishing that it must have illegitimately come into the trustee's own right does not rest upon the beneficiaries. On the contrary, the onus is heavily upon the trustee to show by the clearest and most unimpeachable evidence the legitimacy of his personal acquisition.[11]

Investment of trust fund with himself by the trustee is breach of trust. To make co-trustee liable, some kind of knowledge or connivance or gross negligence or the like contributory factor on the part of the co-trustee has got to be made out. Burden is on plaintiff who seeks to make the co-trustee liable, to make out clearly that the co-trustee had become trustee for the fund and incurred liability therefor of the trustee's breach.[12]

Where about a temple trust, there was credible version of witnesses that public worshipped therein without restriction and it was installed and managed by public, burden lay on the person asserting that it was a private trust.[13]

Where there are suspicious circumstances, onus is on propounder to explain them to Court's satisfaction before the Court accepts the Will as genuine. Where caveator alleges undue influence, fraud and coercion, the onus is on him to prove the same, even where there are no such pleas but circumstances give rise to doubts, it is for the propounder to satisfy the conscience of the court. Court would naturally expect that all legitimate suspicion should be completely removed. When these are removed, the court would grant probate even if the Will might be unnatural and might cut off wholly or in part near relations.[22]

Where it is proved that a Will has been executed with due solemnities by the testator of competent understanding and as apparently free agent, the burden of proving that it was executed under undue influence is on party who alleges it.[23]

When by a Will the natural order of succession is disturbed by some one who propounds the Will, it is incumbent upon the beneficiary of the Will to remove every circumstance of suspicion attaching to the execution of the Will and disposal of property by it.[24]

It was held by the Privy Council held that where the propounder of a Will was the principal beneficiary under it and had taken active part in its execution and registration. It would give rise to some suspicion and requires to be examined with great vigilance and scruitiny; the propounder in such cases will not be entitled to probate unless he clearly proves that the testator approved the Will and by adducing evidence removing any suspecion about the Will.[25]

The Privy Council observed: "The onus of establishing an oral Will is always a very heavy one, and in this connection their Lordships may refer to the ruling of this Board for the guidance of Courts to India in dealing with oral wills in Bahoo Beer Pertab Sahee v. Rajender Pertab Sahee[26] that they must be proved with the utmost precision, and with every circumstance of time and place".[27]

When a Will which has not been registered during the lifetime of the testator, and has not seen the light of the day for about three years after the death of the testator, is put forward and a probate is asked for, something more is required than the bare and formal proof of execution and attestation, by calling in a few only of the persons connected with it. It has to be satisfactorily made out that it is the free and conscious act of the testator and for this purpose the best evidence of all the circumstances connected with the execution of the Will, has to be fully made out.[28]

In the case of Revocation of Will, burden of proof is on the objector, which may be discharged either by direct evidence or by inference.[29]

The propounder of a will has to discharge the burden qua its genuineness as mere its registration is not enough.[30]

COMMENTS

Where in an appeal before the Rent Control Tribunal the tenant raised a new plea in his application for additional evidence that on the date of grant of permission for tenancy for a limited period on the basis of the alleged joint application of the landlord and the tenant, he was out of the country and the said permission was taken by the landlord by playing fraud on the Court, it was held that the burden was on the tenant to prove his absence from the Court on the day of grant of permission.[34] Where the defendant asserted that the suit property was a 'public trust' which the plaintiff did not admit, the burden of proving his contention was on the defendant.[35] Where in a suit for declaration of title, the defendant denied the claim by claiming that the suit land formed the part of General Land Register and was classified as A2, the burden of proving this particular fact was on him.[36] Where a tenant alleged that the rent was paid but no receipt was issued by the landlord, in absence of any explanation for not sending the rent by postal money-order, he could not be deemed to have discharged the burden which was cast upon him.[37] Burden of proving material waste or damage to the building due to unauthorised construction by the tenant, was on the landlord.[38] Where the guarantor of a bank loan pleaded that the hypothecated goods were insured and were lost due to the negligence of the creditor bank, the burden was on the guarantor to prove the alleged negligence.[39] Where inspite of admitted oral partition, the defendant claimed that the disputed strip of land was left in common, burden was on him to prove his claim.[40] Where in a proceeding for maintenance the wife produced 'Nikahnama' as a proof of marriage, signature over which the husband denied, it was for husband to prove that applicant-wife was not his legally wedded wife.[41]

Where the detenus sent unsigned telegrams to various authorities that they were illegally arrested at 11.30 a.m. but they were shown to be arrested 3 p.m. the same day, it was for the detenus to prove that they sent the telegrams prior to the detention order as the said telegrams could not be taken into consideration unless confirmed by signed applications, representations or affidavits.[42] Where in an accidental claim case, the vehicle involved was transferred prior to the accident, the fact that the transferee failed to apply for consequential transfer of the insurance certificate was to be pleaded and proved by the insurer when the claimant is the third party.[43] Where there was abundant evidence to show that the deceased/wife was subjected to cruelty and harassment by the accused persons demanding dowry before her death, burden to show that it was not a dowry death but suicide shifted on the accused.[44] Where in a partition suit the plaintiff claimed by virtue of being the natural son of the defended who admitted his sonship but asserted that he was his foster son, burden to prove the nature of relationship was on the defendant.[45]

Burden of proving that case of accused comes within exceptions.

S. 105. When a person is accused of any offence, the burden of proving the existence of circumstances bringing the case within any of the General Exceptions in the Indian Penal Code (XLV of 1860), or within any special exception or proviso contained in any other part of the same Code, or in any law defining the offence, is upon him, and the Court shall presume the absence of such circumstances.

COMMENTS

1. PRINCIPLE

In criminal cases the burden of proof, using the phrase in its strictest sense, is always upon the prosecution and never shifts, whatever the evidence may be, during the progress of the case. When sufficient proof of the commission of a crime has been adduced and the accused has been connected therewith as the guilty party, then the burden of proof, in another and quite different sense, namely in the sense of introducing evidence in rebuttal of the case for the prosecution is laid upon him. The onus of establishing an exception shifts to the accused when the pleads an exception. This onus can be discharged either by affirmatively establishing the plea taken by an accused person or by eliciting such circumstances which would create a doubt in the mind of the court that the reasonable possibility of the accused acting within the protection of the exception pleaded is not eliminated.[46]

The test is not whether the accused has proved beyond all reasonable doubt that he comes within any exception to the Indian Penal Code, but whether in setting up his defence he has established a reasonable doubt in the case for the prosecution and has thereby earned his right to an acquittal.[47] But this does not mean that the accused must lead evidence. If it is apparent from the evidence on the record, whether produced by the prosecution or defence, that a general exception would apply, then the presumption is removed and it is open to the court to consider whether the evidence proves to the satisfaction of the Court that the accused comes within the exception.[48] Thus, if a man takes the life of another, he should prove circumstances, if any, justifying his doing so. If the act is done in exercise of the right of private defence, it lies upon him to show that he did not exceed that right.

The onus which rests on an accused person under S. 105, to establish his plea of private defence is not as onerous as the unshifting burden which lies on the prosecution to establish every ingredient of the offence with which the accused is charged beyond reasonable doubt.[49] In any event, the discarding of the prosecution story as respects the manner of the causing of the injuries on the victim means that the whole story as to the manner of occurence becomes very doubtful. In such a situation the benefit of doubt must go to the accused.[50]

An accused pleading the right of self defence need not prove it beyond reasonable doubt. It is enough; if he establishes facts which on the test of preponderance of probabilities, make his defence acceptable.

The evidence, though insufficient to establish the exception, may be sufficient to negative one or more of the ingredients of the offence.[51]

Where the plea of insanity is invoked by an accused it is for him to establish that fact.[52]

Under Section 105 of the Evidence Act, the burden of proving the existence of circumstances bringing the case within the exception lies on the accused and the court shall presume the absence of such circumstances. Under Section 105 of the Evidence Act, read with the definition of 'shall presume' in Section 4 thereof, the court shall regard the absence of such circumstances as proved unless, after considering the matters before it, it believes that the said circumstances existed or their existence was so proabable that a prudent man ought, under the circumstances of the particular case, to act upon the supposition that they did exist.

The doctrine of burden of proof in the context of the plea of insanity may be stated in the following propositions: (1) The prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt that the accused had committed the offence with the requisite mens rea and the burden of proving that always rests on the prosecution from the beginning to the end of the trial. (2) There is a rebuttable presumption that the accused was not insane, when he committed the crime, in the sense laid down by S. 84 of the Penal Code; the accused may rebut it by placing before the court all the relevant evidence—oral, documentary or circumstantial, but the burden of proof upon him is no higher than that rests upon a party to civil proceedings. (3) Even if the accused was not able to establish conclusively that he was insane at the time he committed the offence, the evidence placed before the court by the accused or by the prosecution may raise a reasonable doubt in the mind of the court as regards one or more of the ingredients of the offence, including mens rea of the accused and in that case, the Court would be entitled to acquit the accused on the ground that the general burden of proof resting on the prosecution was not discharged.[53]

It has to be shown that (a) accused was insane, at the time when he did the act and that as a result of unsoundness of mind he was incapable of knowing the nature of the act or that he was doing what was really wrong or contrary to law.[54]

There is no conflict between the general burden, which is always on the prosecution and which never shifts and the special burden on the accused to make out his defence of insanity.[55]

An accused person who at his trial had not pleaded the right of private defence, but had raised other pleas inconsistent with such a defence, cannot in appeal set up a case, founded upon the evidence taken at his trial, that he acted in the exercise of the right of private defence; neither is the Court competent to raise such a plea on behalf of the appellant.[56]

2. 'GENERAL EXCEPTIONS'

The General Exceptions here referred to are those applicable to all crimes, and are laid down in Chapter IV of the Indian Penal Code.

This section is a general provision which imposes the burden of bringing himself within an exception upon the person who relies upon the exception; and there is no distinction between a case in which the exception is contained in the body of the statute imposing the prohibition and a case in which it is not so included.[57]

Even when the accused denies, in toto, the act or acts alleged, if evidence of the existence of circumstances bringing the case within a general or special exception is to be found in the evidence for the prosecution, the Court must review the whole evidence and either acquit the accused or convict him of the minor offence as the case may be.[58] This section does not relieve a judge, even in cases where the accused has not pleaded that his case comes within any particular exception, from pointing out to the jury such facts in the evidence as might justify in taking the view that the accused's case was covered by one or other exception.[59] In a case of publication of defamatory article to prove that the publication falls within the exceptions, it is not necessary to produce documents in evidence and get them marked through witnesses, Section 105 does not specify that the evidence must be pleaded or led. If from the evidence on record it is proved that the general exceptions would apply, presumption of such circumstance under Section 105 is removed and the Court can consider whether the evidence on record proves the offence alleged or not.[60] The Supreme Court has laid down that the burden of proving defences arises only when the prosecution discharges its initial and traditional burden of establishing the complicity of the accused.[61] Even under this section the standard of proof required for establishing a defence is that of a prudent man as laid down in Section 3.[62] But within that standard there are degrees of probability. The nature of the burden on an accused person is not as onerous as the general burden of proving the charge beyond reasonable doubt. The accused may discharge his burden by establishing a mere balance of probabilities in his favour with regard to the alleged crime.[63] Yogendra Morarji picked up a quarrel with his labour as to wages and drove away without paying them. They took a short cut and meeting him on the road signalled him to stop. He was led away by a fear complex and fired at them, killing one and injuring another. Whether the workers came to endanger him, nobody knows. But there could have been a probability of that kind also. The Supreme Court gave him the benefit of that probability.

In another case before the Supreme Court[64] a newly wedded wife died of poisoning from strong dose of potassium cyanide. In a short span of only four months of married life she was ill-treated by her husband and in-laws. It was shown in defence that she was very sensitive and awkward. They were allowed the benefit of the probability of suicide. Where two shop-owners were alleged to be negligent to put off the main switch in their shops as a result of which fire broke out affecting the adjoining shops and the facts showed that the shop allotted to the second owner was run by the first owner, the name of the second owner was improperly included as an accused. However, there arose a strong suspicion against the first owner, and commission of the offence could be presumed against him.[65]

Where there is no reliable evidence in support of the prosecution case and where the responsibility arises only out of the plea raised by the accused, the Court can convict him only if the plea amounts to a confession of the guilt, but if the plea only amounts to an admission of facts and raises a plea of justification the Court cannot proceed to deal with the case as if the admission of facts which was not part of the prosecution case was true and the evidence did not warrant the plea of justification.[66] Where a part of a section of an Act has been held unenforceable by the Court, it is for the prosecution to estblish to the satisfaction of the judge that the case comes within the enforceable part; no onus is cast on the accused to prove that his case falls under that part of the section which has been declared unenforceable.[67]

In the case of an offence under Section 14, Drugs and Magic Remedies (Objectionable Advertisements) Act, 1954 in order to bring home the offence charged, the prosecution may have to show that the person to whom the list was sent was not a registered practitioner. Once this is established, it is for the accused to satisfy the court that his case falls under Section 14(1)(c).[68] See Drugs and Magic Remedies (Objectionable Advertisements) Act (1954) Section 3.

Where a person causes the death of another person it is for him to show that his act was removed from the category of murder by one of the exceptions to the section.[69] It is for accused to show that he was not a previous convict and deserved to be treated, as first offender.[70] In a prosecution for occupation of municipal land without permission accused stated that occupation is with permission. Burden of proving such occupation lies on him.[71] It is for applicant to convince the court that the order of forfeiture of published book is to be set aside on the ground that the matter published does not fall within mischief of Section 153-A or Section 295-A Penal Code.[72] Where prosecution proves circumstances which would lead to a reasonable inference that an offence under Section 486, IPC has been committed, the accused has to prove the circumstances set out in the section to claim acquittal[73].

Though there are provisions dealing with cases of exceptions under the Indian Penal Code in criminal cases, the same principle is extended in civil cases also on the principle that when a person relies upon the exception under any general provisions, the onus of proving that his case falls within the exception is on the person who affirms it.[74]

Railway seeking protection of Section 77 of the Railway Act, 1989 has to establish that Section 77 would apply and further that non-delivery was due to circumstances which made it a case of loss.[75]

The Gauhati High Court has held that the Section 6 of the I.P.C. should be read as a proviso to Section 105 of this Act.[76]

3. PRIVATE DEFENCE

Where the evidence in respect to the right of private defence of the accused was conflicting, the evidence favouring the accused should be accepted.[77] There is no inflexible rule of law that the party which sustained smaller number of injuries is the aggressor. It depends upon the facts and circumstances of each case. However, in the instant case, the prosecution side suffered smaller number of injuries as compared to the defence side and was held to be aggressor.[78] Where the eye-witness could not state as to how the occurrence in question started, there arose the reasonable doubt as to who the aggressor was and the accused was entitled to benefit of doubt.[79]

Criticising and discarding by the Court the availability of the plea of self-defence to the accused persons on the ground that the plea was not specifically taken by the accused in their statements under Section 313 Cr.P.C., and because the injured accused did not enter the witness-box.[80]

4. INSANITY

In a plea of insanity the burden of proof is on the accused.[81] Where plea of unsoundness of mind was raised by the accused for the first time at examination under Section 313, Cr.P.C. but the psychiatrist's report showed no symptom of insanity in him and neither any witness was examined to establish it nor any medical certificate was produced to disprove sanity, it was held that burden of proof was not discharged.[82] Where legal insanity of the accused was not proved but the material on record suggested that he suffered from some mental imbalance or acute disturbing factor which provoked him to commit the four murders but what provoked him was not established, it was held to be not a case where sentence should be enhanced to sentence of death.[83]

COMMENTS

This section states that when any fact is specially within the knowledge of any person the burden of proving that fact is upon him. This is an exception to the general rule contained in Section 101, namely, that the burden is on the person who asserts a fact. The principle underlying Section 106 which is an exception to the general rule governing burden of proof applies only to such matters of defence which are supposed to be especially within the knowledge of the defendant. It cannot apply when the fact is such as to be capable of being known also by a person other than the defendant.

It is the bounden duty of a party, personally knowing the whole circumstances of the case, to give evidence on his own behalf and to submit to cross-examination. His non-appearance as a witness would be the strongest possible circumstance going to discredit the truth of his case.[1]

Section 106 should be confined to those cases where a fact is specially within the knowledge of any person.[2] When the matter is within the knowledge of the defendant, he is to prove the same.[3]

This section applies only to the parties to a suit or proceeding.[4]

The Supreme Court had to deal with a case where the appellant was charged with having unauthorisedly claimed second class fare on account of travelling allowance. The prosecution relied on the circumstance that no second class ticket was issued on the relevant date and relying on illustration (b) to Section 106 contended that the burden of proving that the appellant paid the fare was on him. Dealing with this contention the Supreme Court observed that Section 106 is an exception to Section 101 which lays down the general rule that the burden of proof in a criminal case is on the prosecution and Section 106 is not intended to relieve it of the duty. The Supreme Court observed: "On the contrary it is designed to meet certain exceptional cases in which it would to be impossible or at any rate disproportionately difficult for the prosecution to establish facts which are "especially" within the knowledge of the accusel and which he could prove without difficulty or inconvenience. The word "especially" stressess that. It means facts that are pre-eminently or especially within his knowledge."[5] If the section were to be interpreted otherwise it would lead to the very starting conclusion that in a murder case the burden lies on the accused to prove that he did not commit the murder because who could know better than he, whether he did or did not. It is evident that, that cannot be the intention and the Privy Council twice refused to construe this section as reproduced in certain other acts outside India to mean that the burden lies on an accused person to show that he did not commit the crime for which he is tried.[6]

Illustration (b) to Section 106 has obvious reference to a very special type of case namely to offences under Sections 112 and 133 of the Indian Railways Act for travelling or attempting to travel without a pass or ticket or with an insufficient pass etc. Now if a passenger is seen in a railway carriage or at the ticket barrier and is unable to produce a ticket or explain his presence it would obviously be impossible in most cases for the railway to prove or even with due diligence to find out where he came from and where he is going and whether or not he purchased a ticket. On the other hand it would be comparatively simple for the passenger either to produce his pass or ticket or in the case of loss or of some other valid explanation to set it out; and so far as proof is concerned it would be easier for him to prove the substance of his explanation than for the State to establish its falsity.

We recognise that an illustration does not exhaust the full content of the section which it illustrates but equally it can neither curtail nor expand its ambit; and if knowledge of certain facts is as much available to the prosecution, should it choose to exercise due diligence, as to the accused the facts cannot be said to be "especially" within the knowledge of the accused. This is a section which must be considered in a common sense way and the balance of convenience and the disproportion of the labour that would be involved in finding out and proving certain facts balanced against the triviality of the issue at stake and the case with which the accused could prove them, are all matters that must be taken into consideration. The section cannot be used to undermine the well established rule of law that, save in very exceptional class of cases, the burden is on the prosecution and never shifts".[7]

In Seneviratne v. R,[8] the Privy Council held that Section 106 does not cast any burden on the accused to prove that he had not committed the offence by proving facts lying specially within his knowledge, that if anything is unexplained which the jury think the accused could explain then they, not only may, but must, find him guilty.[9]

In Sawal Das v. State of Bihar[10] the Supreme Court observed: "Learned Counsel for the appellant contended that Section 106 of the Evidence Act could not be called in aid by the prosecution because that section applies only where a fact relating to the actual commission of the offence is within the special knowledge of the accused, such as the circumstances in which, or the intention with which, an accused did a particular act alleged to constitute an offence. The language of Section 106 of the Evidence Act does not in our opinion warrant putting such a narrow construction upon it. This Court held in Gurcharan Singh v. State of Punjab[11] that the burden of proving a plea specially set up by an accused which may absolve him from criminal liability, certainly lies upon him. It is a different matter that the quantum of evidence by which he may succeed in discharging his burden of creating reasonable belief, that circumstances absolving him from criminal a liability may have existed, is lower than the burden resting upon the prosecution to establish the guilt of an accused beyond reasonable doubt.

Neither the application of Section 103 nor that of 106 of the Evidence Act could, however, absolve the prosecution from the duty of discharging its general or primary burden of proving the prosecution case beyond reasonable doubt. It is only when the prosecution has led evidence which, if believed, will sustain a conviction, or which makes out a prima facie case, that the question arises of considering facts of which the burden of proof may lie upon the accused. The crucial question in the case before us is: "Has the prosecution discharged its initial or general and primary burden of proving the guilt of the appellant beyond reasonable doubt."

The Supreme Court observed: "The principle underlying Section 106 which is an exception to the general rule governing burden of proof applies only to such matters of defence which were supposed to be specially within the knowledge of the party concerned. It cannot apply when the fact is such as to be capable of being known also by persons other than the party".[12]

It was held that when various links in the prosecution case have been satisfactorily made out pointing the accused as the probable assailant and the proximity of the accused to the deceased as regards the time and situation, and if the accused does not offer any explanation which might afford a reasonable basis for a conclusion consistent with his innocence such absence of explanation or false explanation would be an additional link to the prosecution links. Following this principle in In re : Naina Md.[13] it was held that though Section 106 does not cast any burden on the accused, if some facts are specially within his knowledge he has to prove the same which could support any theory or hypothesis compatible with his innocence.

This section does not cast any burden on an accused person to prove that no crime was committed by proving facts specially within his knowledge nor does it warrant the conclusion that if anything is unexplained which the court thinks the accused could explain, he ought therefore to be found guilty.[14]

It does not affect the onus of proving the guilt of the accused. That onus rests the prosecution and is not shifted on to the accused by reason of the section.[15] It is only in cases where the facts proved by the evidence give rise to reasonable inference of guilt unless the same is rebutted, and such inference can be negatived by proof of some fact which in its nature can only be within the special knowledge of the accused that the burden of proving the fact is on the accused.[16] This section cannot be used to shift the onus of establishing an essential ingredient of the offence on the accused.[17] To infer guilt of the accused from the absence of a reasonable explanation (or a false explanation) where the other circumstances are not by themselves enough to call for his explanation would be to relieve the prosecution of its burden.[18]

In cases of criminal breach of trust, the burden is on the prosecution, initially to prove the guilt of the accused, and that burden is not shifted on to the accused by reason of Section 106 which is not intended to relieve the prosecution of its initial burden of proof which is fundamental in criminal jurisprudence.[19]

It is only when the prosecution led evidence, if believed, which would sustain a conviction, then the burden of proving anything would lie on the accused under Section 106.[20]

Section 106 cannot be involved to make up for inability of the prosecution to produce evidence to prove the guilt of the accused.[21]

This section is not intended to be used to place upon the accused the burden of proving his innocence.[22]

Once the court is satisfied that the evidence either direct or circumstantial is acceptable against the accused and if the accused takes up a plea based on facts which are within his special knowledge, it is for him to prove those facts under Section 106. The standard of proof by the accused in not so high as in the case of prosecution.[23]

Where a person was charged for using iron material for a purpose other than the specific purpose for which a permit was given, it was held that the purpose for which it was used was in the special knowledge of the accused, and he has to prove the same under Section 106 and merely because the prosecution failed to prove the misuse of the material which is in the negative form, the accused cannot escape liability.[24] Where a postman was charged with criminal mis-appropriation of money-order amounts and when the accused admitted not having delivered the amounts to the payee, but gave it to some boy in that house and the other students living in that room denied receiving the amount, it was held that as it was within the knowledge of the accused to whom he gave the money, it was for him to prove the same under Section 106.[25] When the accused was prosecuted for occupation of municipal land without permission and when the accused pleaded that the occupation is with permission, he is to prove that he had permission.[26]

Where a postmaster was charged for the offence of forgery for having signed moneyorder receipts as payee and the accused pleaded alibi, it was held that Section 106 was not attracted and the accused could not be asked to prove as to who signed the receipt and who are witnessess to it.[27]

The burden of proving alibi undoubtally, lies on the accused, but even so, the burden of proving the case is on the prosecution irrespective of whether or not the accused have made out a plausible defence.[28]

In the case of an offence under Section 5(3)(a) under the Explosives Act, on account of an explosion in a licensed premises causing some death of minor children, it was held that it was for the prosecution to prove all the ingredients of the offence, and Section 106 would not absolve it from proving its case; if once that is proved the accused may prove that minors were not employed in the manufacture of explosives or that explosives were not manufactured at all on the day of occurrance.[29] In the case of Explosive Substances Act, it is only after the prosecution proves conscious possession and actual control of the incriminating article with guilty knowledge, that accused should explain his possession.[30]

When the accused pleads the first exception to Section 499, IPC, viz., that the imputation is true and made for the public good in a defamation case, it is for him to prove facts to come within that exception.[31] When a corpse concealed from the public view is discovered on the information given by the accused, a reasonable inference that the accused himself concealed it can be drawn, in the absence of any explanation as to how he obtained that knowledge under Section 106.[32] When an accused fired a pistol causing superficial injuries he would be deemed to have fired the pistol with knowledge that the shot would be fatal, but if the accused pleads that he used defective ammunition, then it is he that should prove it, as it is within his knowledge that it contained defective ammunition.[33] In an offence for misappropriation under Section 409, I.P.C. proof of the manner in which the money was misappropriated is not necessary. The burden is on the accused to show how the money was utilised.[34]

Several persons were found at eleven o'clock at night on a spot outside the city of Agra, all carrying guns concealed under their clothes. None of them had a licence to carry arms and none of them could give any reasonable explanation of the presence at the spot under the particular circumstances. It was proved that dacoities had been frequent in the neighbourhood. It was held that they were guilty under Section 402 of the Indian Penal Code as it was not shown by them that the object for which they had assembled was not that of committing dacoity.[35]

In the case of dacoity when the prosecution establishes some circumstances giving rise to a legitimate inference that the accused's intention was to commit dacoity then it is for the accused to prove that their intention was different under illustration (a) of Section 106.[36]

2. INTENTION, MENS REA

The Privy Council in Srinivas Mall v. Emperor[37] held that the court should bear in mind that unless the statute rules out mens rea as a constitutent part of the crime an accused should not be found guilty of an offence against the criminal law unless he has got a guilty mind. In a case where words describing mens rea do not appear in the definition of the crime, it is for the accused to show that he acted without mens rea.[38]

Intention or guilty knowledge of the accused has to be proved by the prosecution and it is not on the accused.[39]

It is not for the prosecution to anticipate and eliminate all possible defence of circumstances which may exonerate an accused. If the accused had a different intention, that is a fact especially within his knowledge which he must prove.[40]

When there is failure to honour a negotiable instrument, the prosecution must prove the circumstances showing the intention to cheat to make out an offence under Section 420, I.P.C.[41]

3. ALIBI

Burden of proving the plea of alibi by positive evidence lies on the accused who raises it.[42]

4. PROHIBITION CASES

The Supreme Court held that the burden to establish that the offence took place within the jurisdiction of a particular magistrate is upon the prosecution and therefore such knowledge cannot be said to be especially within the knowledge of the accused to prove anything under Section 106.[43]

The Gujarat H.C., however, following Shambhunath Mehra's Case[44] and explaining Krishnakumar's case[45] held that though the burden on the prosecution would not shift to prove its case, under Section 106 the accused can establish that he had consumed liquor at a place where it was not an offence to consume.[46] The accused can also show under Section 106 that what he consumed was exempted liquor.[47]

5. CUSTOMS

In proceedings under Section 167(8) of Sea Customs Act for confiscation of goods, the Collector of Customs has to be guided by the provisions of Section 106 besides the principles of natural justice, though the Evidence Act and the Criminal Procedure Code do not in terms govern the onus of proof in such proceedings. The broad effect of the application of the basic principle underlined Section 106 to cases under Section 167 (8) of the Sea Customs Act is that the department would be deemed to have discharged its burden if it adduces only so much evidence, circumstantial or direct, as is sufficient to raise a presumption in its favour with regard to the existence of the facts sought to be proved.[48]

Burden of proving innocent receipt of goods under the Customs Act is on the accused.[49] Where the question was whether the accused had a valid permit to export uncleaned tur-dhal, it was held that the burden is on the prosecution to prove that the commodity which was being exported was uncleaned tur-dhal and it was not for the accused to prove that the commodity which he was exporting was not uncleaned tur-dhal.[50] Where foreign goods were seized under the Customs Act, the accused pleaded that the goods were sent to him by a broker from Bombay, the accused has to prove those facts which are within his knowledge.[51] The burden of proving that goods are not smuggled goods shall be on the person from whose possession goods were seized as Section 123(1) of Customs Act 1962 is similar to the provisions of Section 106.[52] Where a person was found in possession of gold with foreign markings, the Supreme Court held that burden lay upon him to account for his possession.[53] In a case for the offences of smuggling goods, when the accused pleads that he had no hand in smuggling it is for him to prove that fact.[54] When contraband gold of foreign origin was seized from the petitioner at the Imphal-border and the petitioner No. 2 admitted ownership of gold and he handed it over to petitioner No. 1 inside the border for being taken to Imphal, it was held that the petitioners must prove the special fact within their knowledge as to how they came into possession of gold.[55] The burden is on the importer to produce the permission granted to him under Foreign Exchange Regulation Act 1947.[56]

The burden of proving unlawful importation of goods is on the customs authorities, when the goods seized are not covered by Section 178-A of the Customs Act. In such cases Section 106 does not apply.

The Supreme Court observed: "Section 106 of the Evidence Act in terms does not apply to a proceeding under the said Act. But it may be assumed that the principle underlying the said section is of universal application and under that section any fact especially within the knowledge of any person, the burden of proving that fact is upon him".[57]

It is not for the accused to prove the negative, namely that the goods were lawfully imported either by himself or by somebody else.[58]

6. PREVENTION OF CORRUPTION

The Supreme Court held that the offence under Section 5(1)(c) of Prevention of Corruption Act is constituted when the property has been received by the accused for or in the name, or on account of the master or employer and it is complete when the servant fraudulently mis-appropriates that property. And the accused under Section 106 has to prove his innocence.[59]

7. ESSENTIAL COMMODITIES ETC.

In a prosecution under the Essential Commodities Act, the dealer accused has to show how borken rice came to be mixed with the whole rice, because that matter is specially within his knowledge.[60]

Under the Mysore Movement of Timber (Control) Order, 1948, the prosecution should prove not only that timber was found in the house of the accused but also his possession commenced more than 24 hours prior to the discovery, and Section 106 cannot be invoked against the accused.[61]

8. N.D. AND P.S. ACT

Where the factory from where the psychotropic substances were seized belonged to the accused, burden was on him prove how the offending articles came to be found in his factory.[62]

9. RAILWAY

There is a duty on the part of the Railway to disclose the manner of dealing with the consignment. Where the facts were within the knowledge of the railway administration, it must prove such facts.[63]

There is nothing in Section 74-D of the Railways Act to indicate any legislative intent to override the provisions of either Section 106 or Section 114 of the Evidence Act.[64]

When certain articles are delivered to the accused for booking them by signing a requisition form and he fails to book them and they are missing, as the matter is within his special knowledge, he is bound to explain the missing of the articles under Section 106.[65] In a case where the accused travelled without pass or ticket, it is for the prosecution to prove that there was intention to defraud the railway administration; mere travelling without pass or ticket does not attract Section 112 of the Railways Act. The question of intention is one which depends upon circumstances of each case. If once that is proved then the accused may prove as to how his travel without a ticket was not in contravention of Section 68 of the Railways Act and to that extent the burden is on him; as such facts will be especially within his knowledge.[66]

When a reply to a notice was given by the General Manager Railways indicating the receipt of notice, the Railways has to prove the actual date of receipt of notice, to show that the claim was out of time.[67]

10. NON-DELIVERY OR SHORT DELIVERY OF GOODS

In suits for damages for the loss of goods in transit it is for the plaintiff to prove that the loss occurred due to the negligence or want of skill of the defendant carrier under Section 74(c), but it is also the duty of the carrier to show under Section 74(d) how the consignment was dealt with during the transit, as that is a matter within the special knowledge of the defendant or its servants and agents. The defendant must first adduce evidence disclosing its treatment of the goods and the plaintiff may rely on that evidence in addition to any tendered by him to show that the loss had occurred by reason of the defendant's default or negligence or that the loss could not have occurred but for such default or negligence. If the defendant does not adduce all the evidence at its command the plaintiff may, in proper cases, ask the court to make a presumption under Section 114(g) against the defendant.[68]

Under Section 80 of the Railways Act, there is a burden on the plaintiff to prove that the goods sent through railway was lost or damaged, and he cannot take advantage of Section 106.[69] In the case of claim for compensation from the railways, if the plaintiff does not call for any disclosure from the railways, it was held that no duty lies on railway to disclose anything or how the consignment was dealt with during the transit and no adverse presumption against the railway can be drawn.[70] However, the railway to get protection under Section 74-A of the Railways Act has to show that short delivery was due to defective packing.[71]

When the goods were insured and sent by railways and the policy covered the risk of theft, the risk was to last only for three days after the arrival of the train at the destination, and no liability for the loss would attach unless notice is given within 10 days of the said risk to the Insurance Company. In such cases the onus of proving as to when the train arrived at the destination would be on the assured and that notice was also given as required before saddling the company with liability for loss.[72]

When there is discrepancy as to the entry in receipt and the quantum of goods delivered, the burden is on the railway to explain the cause for such discrepancy.[73] When the weight of the goods mentioned in the receipt did not tally with actual weight of the goods delivered to the railway and there was no admission by the railway of the actual weight, it was held that the railway is not liable for short delivery of goods.[74]

If the railway did not adduce evidence negativing the allegation of misconduct or negligence on the part of the railway, it was held that negligence was established by inference.[75] In a suit against railway for damages for short delivery of goods when the plaintiff did not adduce evidence showing prima facie proof of negligence or mis-conduct on the part of the railway, it was held that there is no duty on the railway to call material witnesses to prove facts which may be within its special knowledge. The principle res ipsa loquitur is not applicable.[76] When the terms of the risk-note provide that it is for the plaintiff to prove mis-conduct, it was held that inference from non-disclosure by the railway cannot be drawn against him.[77] When the risk-note was not signed by the consignor of the goods then under Section 106, it is the bailee/railway to whom the goods have been entrusted that has to prove that the loss caused was not due to its negligence.[78]

When a consignment was carried only to some extent by the defendant railway and from there upto the destination in Pakistan by the Pakistan Railway it was held that non-delivery at the destination could not be held to be within the knowledge of the defendant railway, under Section 106.[79] When mis-conduct was alleged on the part of the railway for the loss of goods, it was held that the delay in forwarding consignment can not be properly regarded as mis-conduct, unless delay is deliberately caused by the railway administration.[80]

When the allegation of damage to goods was against a particular railway administration, the plaintiff must prove the same. And he cannot take advantage of Section 106 or Section 114 of Evidence Act, as such onus of proof does not shift.[81]

When the damage was due to fire the consignor/bailor is to prove lack of sufficient care by the bailee.[82] A Steam-ship Company has to prove that the cargo was actually carried on the deck, in the case of accepted cargoes under Section 106.[83] In the case of bailment the plaintiff must prove bailment and the bailee must prove that he took care of the goods. And reliance under Section 106 cannot be placed.[84]

11. NEGLIGENCE

In case of rash and negligent driving, the bus turned turtle. It was held res ipsa loquitur (fact speaks for itself) would apply and the negligence on the part of the driver would be presumed. The best evidence against negligence would be of the driver himself under Section 106.[85]

However, it was held that the maxim res ipsa loquitur loses its importance when all the evidence is tendered by both parties. If the plaintiff alleges negligence and gives particulars of it, it is on him to prove it.[86]

In the case of fatal accidents if it suggests negligence, the defendant must prove lack of negligence.[87]

In a suit for damages for negligence, plaintiff proved negligence on the part of the defendant, but the defendant suppressed all important materials in its possession. It was held that Section 106 or the doctrine of res ipso loquitur is attracted.[88]

Where the evidence showed that the combustible material was stored by the tenant in the premises admittedly in his possession regarding which sufficient warning was given by the landlord and tenant also did not take any steps at the time of fire to prevent it by reporting to the authorities concerned, the burden would shift on the tenant to prove that he was not negligent and not responsible for fire.[89]

12. MESNE PROFITS

Initially, onus of proof regarding profits earned lies on the person accountable for mesne profits.[90]

In cases of mesne profits the plaintiff would be entitled to get mesne profits calculated or arrived at on the basis of the prevailing rates or on the basis of what the person in occupation would have actually received, with ordinary deligence under Section 106, the burden of proving the amount actually received will lie on the person who received the amount, but the burden of proving the profits that might have been received is on the person who claims it.[91] When the question of mesne profits is to be determined when the defendant claims that he made improvements, it is for him to prove how much amount he spent for improvements. And if the plaintiff alleges waste by the defendant, he has to prove the extent of the waste as the claim for waste would stand on the same footing as claim for mesne profits.[92]

13. LANDLORD AND TENANT

The burden of proof regarding payment of rent lies on the tenant and liability regarding which is not discharged by mere oral allegation of payment without receipts and without satisfactory explanation for non-recourse to money order.[93]

The amount spent on improvements is a fact within the special knowledge of the tenant who has to prove the same.[1]

In a suit by the landlord for eviction of a residential building under the Delhi and Ajmer Rent-Control Act, it was held that the landlord must allege that the tenant has built a house or acquired vacant possession of a suitable residence. The onus to prove facts within the special knowledge of a party would be on him under Section 106.[2]

When the landlord places material showing prima facie that the tenant created a sub-tenancy, it is for the tenant to show facts within his knowledge how the alleged sub-tenant occupied the premises and the nature of relationship between him and those occupying and if he does not prove the same the landlord is entitled for eviction.[3]

A tenant claiming exemption from eviction under Kerala Land Reforms Act of 1964, has to show that he is a kudikidappukaran within the meaning of that Act. The burden cannot be placed on the landlord to show that the value of the building is such that the Act does not apply on the ground that he has special knowledge of its value.[4]

14. ELECTION LAWS

Where a charge is made in an election petition that the election expenses did not show certain expenditure, it is for the petitioner to prove it, and the onus is not on the successful candidate and Section 106 has no application.[5]

Where a successful candidate prior to the election published a bulletin alleging that his rival candidate/petitioner through his worker distributed or offered coats and blankets to the voters at a particular place or on a particular day, the petitioner adduced evidence to show that it was not possible for his worker to be present at a particular place on that particular date. It was held that the burden on the petitioner was discharged and the burden shifted on the successful candidate to dislodge the assertions.[6]

In a petition to set aside an election on the ground of corrupt practices, the allegations must be established beyond reasonable doubt as the proceedings are of quasi-criminal character, and there is a presumption of innocence in favour of the respondent.[7]

15. MASTER & SERVANTS

In the case of a servant charged with misappropriation of goods of his master, if the failure to account is due to an accidental loss, the facts being within the servant's knowledge, it is for him to explain the loss.[8] In a case for breach of contract of employment by the employer, the onus is on the employer to show that the employee ought reasonably to have taken certain mitigating steps and the existence or non-existence of other jobs is not a matter which could be said to be especially within the knowledge of the employee within the terms of Section 106.[9] In the case of reinstatement of workman and payment of back-wages, the facts about employment or non-employment or the efforts made or not made to secure alternative employment are within the special knowledge of the employee.[10]

Whether a petitioner, a government servant, was included by the Director in the list of superseded persons sent to the Public Service Commission is a fact within the special knowledge of the Director.[11] In a case the services of the appellant were terminated by the Government on a certain ground and it was claimed that a prior show cause notice was given to him the service of which he denied. The Govt. could not produce any proof of service of the notice as the records had been weeded out. However, there was on records the explanation of the appellant submitted by him before the termination of his service. It was held that the burden of proving the service of notice was discharged.[12]

In a suit to declare the order of demotion and dismissal as illegal and ultra vires, the burden is on the plaintiff to prove the same and in such cases Section 102, applies but not Section 106.[13]

16. TAX-LAWS

In the case of an assessee partner of a firm a credit-entry of deposit made by his wife appeared in the account books of the firm and there was a similar deposit on the same date made by the wife of another partner, it was held that the source from which money was realised by the wife need not be proved by the assessee; that the department cannot hold that the other deposit made by another partner's wife was the amount of undisclosed income of the assessee.[14]

The burden is on the assessee to explain the true nature and source of the income.[15] The assessee has to prove that a particular income has its origin in the capital amount.[16] Where remittances were made from non-taxable territory and the Income Tax Department established the source, the presumption that remittances are out of accumulated profits arises. Regarding the question as to where from remittances are made being a matter within the special knowledge of the assessee, he has to prove that those remittances are from source other than accumulated profits.[17] When the assessee fails to explain the nature of cash credit entry, the income tax officer may presume that it falls under income from other sources.[18] The burden of establishing that a disputed amount is not assessee's income lies on the assessee and not on the department.[19] When an assessee claims exemption he should give detailed facts entitling him to exemption as under Section 106 when any fact is specially within the knowledge of any person, the burden of proving that fact is upon him.[20]

Assessability at single point and non-assessability at other points is for the assessor to prove.[21]

In a suit for recovery of an amount of reward announced by the Board of Direct Taxes, it was held that the burden lies on the defendant to prove realisation of extra taxes and if the defendants suppressed assessment record regarding realisation of extra taxes which it has to do, under Section 106 a presumption can be drawn against the defendant under Section 114(g).[22]

How much amount was expended from out of the licence fee would be within the knowledge of the Zilla Parishad and is has to prove the same.[23]

A person who collects Tehbazari dues and fails to account for the collections has to porve how he gave discharge of those amounts under Section 106.[24]

17. HUSBAND AND WIFE

In an application for maintenance by a wife, the onus lies on the husband to disclose his income under Section 106.[25]

In a suit for declaration that the marriage was invalid on the ground of non-performance of essential formalities, the burden is on the plaintiff to prove the non-performance of such formalities which would invalidate the marriage, as it would be reasonable and proper to presume that the qualified purohit attached to the temple had complied with all the ceremonial formalities for a valid Hindu marriage.[26]

As to the facts relating to the pregnancy of a woman and the birth of her child, they would be within her knowledge and so she has to prove the same.[27] When cruelty was alleged as a ground for judicial separation the petitioner has to prove the same.[28]

18. MISCELLANEOUS

Where A hires a bicycle from B and alleges that he has lost it, it is A that should prove as a fact which is purely within his knowledge and B cannot be expected to know how it was lost and under what circumstances.[29]

The question as to when the petitioner migrated to Pakistan is a matter which is especially within his knowledge and so he must prove it. And the burden is not on the government to prove it.[30] In cases of acquisition of land for development, for industrial and residential purposes, the onus of proving facts and circumstances lying specially within the knowledge of the official who formed the opinion resulting in the notification issued rests upon that official.[31] When the question is whether a Sub-Divisional Controller had authority to enter into a contract on behalf of the Government, it is for the Government to produce the file containing the relevant orders as such fact is especially within the knowledge of the Government.[32]

Where the plaintiff has personally executed a deed of assignment which he seeks to be set aside on the ground of it being a Benami deed he cannot keep himself away from the witness box, as he has to prove the facts which are within his knowledge to show that the deed is not actually what it purports to be.[33]

When damages are claimed for violation of Trade Marks Act, it is for the defendants to produce the account books to show the amounts received which matter is entirely within their special and exclusive knowledge.[34] In a suit for recovering damages against the owners of a vessel, there was allegation by the plaintiff that the owner of the vessel and the charterers of another vessel were one and the same entity and the vessel was owned by the named individual. The defendant owners produced no document to disclose shareholding pattern of either the owner or the shareholding of the majority shareholder which must be considered to be within the special knowledge of the owners and they were under obligation under Section 106 to disclose the name of the majority shareholder.[35] In a case under a Sale of Goods Act, the person claiming the refund has to prove that he has suffered in loss or injury because it is in his special or exclusive knowledge.[36]

It is for the plaintiff to prove that his suit is within time when time begins to run from the date of plaintiff's knowledge of a particular event, since the knowledge of that event can only be within the knowledge of the plaintiff and no one else.[37] Where a person has taken an elephant on hire the burden of proving the number of days for which the elephant has worked is on him since that fact is particularly within his knowledge.[38] Where infringement of a patent is alleged the defendant is to prove that his process of manufacture was different as such matter would be specially within his knowledge.[39] Where blocks were recovered from the possession of a printer which were indentical or almost identical with the genuine trade mark, it is for the printer to prove that he had no knowledge of the existence of the original trade-mark.[40] Where there was failure to observe the terms as to accounts in the licence issued in a prescribed form, the onus is on the licensee to prove that he was prevented by reasonable cause to maintain accounts correctly.[41] Where a party claimed to be an agriculturist within the meaning of Section 2(2) of U.P. Agriculturists Relief Act, it was held that the onus of proving that under the proviso to Section 2(2) he is deprived of the status has to be proved by the opposite party.[42] In a suit for partition of joint family property mere mention of an arbitration agreement and award does not bar the suit. It is necessary for the defendant to plead necessary facts in support his plea to bar the suit.[43]

19. FACTS WITHIN THE KNOWLEDGE OF A PARTY

Under the Slum Areas (Improvement and Clearance Act) 1956, when the eviction petition is filed, income of the tenant is a question to be considered. Income of the tenant, is a fact especially within the knowledge of the tenant and so he has to prove the same under Section 106, showing that he has no sufficient means for securing alternative accommodation.[44] Special facts such as the competence of a party to espouse a cause under the U.P. Industrial Disputes Act 1947, are to be proved under Section 106 by the espousing party.[45] Where a State Government passed an order under delegated authority with the prior concurrence of the Central Government and when that order is challenged, it was held that whether there was concurrence or not was within the special knowledge of the State Government, and so it has to be proved under Section 106.[46] When a premises is let and a stranger other than the lessee is in possession the burden is on the lessee to show that he is not a sub-lessee but a licensee as it is within his special means of knowledge.[47]

Where the dead body of the victim of rape was found on the cot inside the house of the accused, the burden was on him to explain how the dead body happened to be there.[48] The Court would be justified in appropriate cases to draw the presumption that the abductors themselves could be the killers of the abducted victim, unless they explained otherwise as to what they did with the prey.[49] Where a housewife died of drowning in the well in the courtyard of the house of the in-laws and at the time of the incident only the accused persons were in the house, burden was on them to prove what happened on that night which resulted in her death.[50] Where the accused husband alone was present with the deceased at the time and place of offence and he absconded soon after the incident, he was bound to explain the fact, it being in his special knowledge and in the absence of any explanation the only possible inference would be that he participated in the Act.[51] Where the appellant was charged for purchasing paddy from a

1. PRINCIPLE AND SCOPE

Halsbury states (4th Edn., Vol. 17, page 85): "There is generally no presumption of law by which the fact that a person was alive or dead on a given date can be established but the question must be decided on the facts of the particular case.[53]

This section provides that if it appears that a person, whose present existence is in question, was alive within thirty years and nothing whatever appears to suggest the probability of his being dead the court is bound to regard the fact of his still being alive as proved.

Section 107 is almost similar to illustration(d) of Section 114 which says that a thing or state of things which has been shown to be in existence within a period shorter than that whithin which such things or state of things usually ceases to exist is still in existence. Illustration to Section 114 deals with the presumption of continuance of a thing or state of things, whereas this section deals with the presumption of continuance of life.

Sections 107 and 108 must be read together because the latter is only a proviso to the rule contained in the former and both constitute one rule when so read together.[54]

Under Section 107, where there is a question whether a man is alive or dead, if it is shown that he was alive within 30 years the burden that he is dead is on the person who asserts it. Thus the section

53. In so far as old cases speak of presumption of continuance of life as if it were a presumption of law, they are not consistent with the modern authorities. For such cases, see Wilson v. Hudges, (1803) 2 East 12; Napaan v. Das Hkaught, (1837) 2 M&W 894; Lapsley v. Grierson, (1848) 1 HL cas 498 at 595; R v. Willshire, (1880) 6 QBD 336 CCR; R v. Jones, (1883) 11 QBD 118, CCR; R v. Lumley, (1869) LR 1 CCR 196; Re Phene's Trust, (1870) 5 Ch 139; In re : Aldersey, Gibson v. Hall, (1905) 2 Ch 181; MocDarmaid v. A—G, p. 232 (1950) 1 All ER 497; Chard v. Chard, (1955) 3 All ER 721.

deals with a presumption of continuance of life, whereas under Section 108, if it is proved that person as not heard of for seven years by such of those persons who would naturally have heard of him if he was alive, then the burden of proving that he is alive is shifted to the person who asserts it. Thus under Section 108, there is a presumption of death, once it is proved that the person was not heard of for seven years. That section is a proviso to Section 107 is made clear by the opening words "provided that".

Where a person is alive within 30 years the burden is on the person claiming that he is dead to prove the same. If he is not heard of for 7 years the burden is on the person who claims that he is alive.[55]

In one case the Supreme Court observed that in view of the fact that one Sardul Singh was alive on May 24, 1960, it shall be presumed that he was not dead on May 24, 1970. As the appellant had alleged that Sardul Singh was dead on that date, the onus to prove that fact shall be on him.[56]

But as soon as anything appears which suggests the probability of a person being dead, the presumption disappears, and the question has to be determined on the balance of proof, Markby, 83.

Where a person was not heard of for many years previously but was alive on the date of filing of the suit and impleaded as a defendant, the question of presumption of death does not arise.[57]

2. PRESUMPTION REBUTTABLE

In either case (Sections 107 & 108) the presumption is rebuttable. The presumption embodied in Section 108 is by way of a proviso to Section 107; if two sections are read together, it would be evident that it would be erroneous to seek to apply both Sections 107 and 108 to one and the same case and at the same time. Before a presumption under Section 108 is raised, it has to be found by making an appropriate enquiry that the person has not been heard for 7 years by those who ought to have heard of him; in that enquiry it is permissible to show that the allegation that the person has not been heard of for over 7 years is not true and that there is evidence to show that he is alive or has been heard of within the period; if it is proved that the person has been heard within 7 years it is obvious then that the presumption of death, under Section 108 can not be raised.[58]

If it is shown that a man was alive within 30 years, the presumption under Section 107 is that he is alive but the presumption is rebuttable but then the burden shifts to the person who asserts that the man is dead.[59]

Where the allegation was that the defendant died before passing a decree, it was held that the onus is on the plaintiff to prove that the defendant was alive on the date of passing of the decree.[60]

The presumption under Section 107 does not apply to petitions for declaration of nullity of the marriage by reason of Sections 7 and 10(4) of the Divorse Act.[61]

If a person has not been heard of for seven years, there is a presumption of law that he is dead under secion 108[62] and the burden of proving that he is alive is shifted to the otherside.[63] Under Section 108, it is not required that the Court should hold that a person is dead after the expiration of seven years but it only provides shifting of burden to the person who asserts that the person is alive.[64]

In a matter under the Rent Control Act on application of the tenant's mother stating that her son was not heard of for more than 13 years and hence he be presumed to be dead and she be impleaded as a party, it was held that a separate suit for declaration of the original tenant to be dead is not necessary as

Section 108 does not prescribe any procedure.[65] Where on an application to implead the heirs of a party to a suit presumed to be dead on the ground of not being heard of for seven years, nothing was brought on record to show that the said party was no more, it was held that the man not heard of for seven years can be deemed to have met with civil death and not the death occasioned on his last breath and the ingredients of Sections 107 and 108 cannot be taken advantage of.[66]

3. PRESUMPTION DOES NOT EXTEND TO THE DATE OF DEATH

The presumption of death does not extend to the date of death[67]. There is no presumption that he died at the end of the first seven years or at any particular date[68] or at any subsequent period.[69]

It is not a presumption in law that a person was alive for seven years from the time when he was last heard of. Sections 107 and 108 deal with the procedure to be followed when a question is raised before a court, as to whether a person is alive or dead, but do not lay down any presumption as to how long a man was alive or at what time he died. Assuming that the court could make a presumption that a person was alive for seven years after he was last heard of, it depends on the circumstances of each case whether the court could draw such a presumption or not.[70]

4. PRESUMPTION OF DEATH DATE ON WHICH THE QUESTION IS RAISED

The presumption of death would be the date on which the question was raised and not on an entecedent date. If the person is not presumed to be dead on an antecedent date prior to the one on which the question is raised, the natural inference is that he was alive till the question was raised. To a case where the proviso is attracted, the presumption under Section 107 does not apply.

The English law is in no way different from the Indian Law.[71]

The earliest date to which the death can be presumed can only be the date when the suit or claim of that right is filed, it cannot have a further retrospective effect.[72] Where a suit was filed exactly after the expiry of seven years the court said that without proof of the fact that death occurred before the enforcement of the Hindu Womens Rights to Property Act, rights under the Act could not be acquired.[73]

The Supreme Court observed in a case before it,[74] that the presumption about the death of Sardul Singh even if raised would be restricted to the date of the filing of the petition. The court cited the Privy Council decision to the effect that "there is only one presumption and that is that when these suits were instituted in 1916 Bhagwan Gir was no longer alive. There is no presumption at all as to the time he died. That, like any other fact, is a matter of proof".[75]

Where a person disappeared in December, 1950 and did not draw his allowance in January, 1951 and was not heard of for more than 7 years, it was held that in the absence of any evidence of probable motive of foul play or accident one has to speculate as to the cause of his disappearance, and it could not be presumed that he was dead, on the date of his disappearance and in the absence of proof that he was alive, the only conclusion possible is that he was dead at the time the question arose (date of plaint)[76].

In a case where the wife of a person alienated the property to the plaintiff on 4-6-1962 and the plaintiff was dispossessed by the defendants in July 1962 and the vendor's husband was not heard of for 7 years, it was held that when the defendants challenged the right of the plaintiff's vendor to dispose of the property, in the absence of any proof as to the date of death of the transferor's husband, it can be presumed that he died earliest on the day when the plaintiff brought the suit. And since on the date of the earliest on the day when the plaintiff brought the suit. And since on the date of the transfer there was no proof that he was not alive, the plaintiff's suit could not be maintained and the presumption of death cannot be given a further retrospective effect.[77] The true principle of law is that where a party relies on a specific date of death of a person who has not been heard of for 7 years or more he must prove the specific date. If that cannot be proved the earliest date to which the death can be presumed can be the date on which the suit was filed, and it cannot be given further retrospective effect.[78]

In a suit for possession of property alleging that the successor-in-interest had died and his line was extinct the suit was dismissed after 6 years on the ground that the death was not proved and hence the suit was premature. It was held that provisions of Section 14(1) of the Limitation Act do not apply to the suit as Section 108 raises only presumption of death, but not the time of death.[79]

The relevant point of time at which the presumption under Section 108 is available when the factum of the death of the person concerned becomes material and not the date of the suit; where the material point of time was the date of adoption viz., 15-8-1955 and it was established that the person to whom the adoption was made was not heard of by any person who should have heard of him, if he was alive, for seven years prior to 15-8-1955, then the presumption under Section 108 would be that he was dead on or before 15-8-1955[80].

It was observed in Ram Nathan v. Varadarajulu, (1970 AP 246) that the principles underlying Section 108 was not properly understood in Shankarapa v. Shivabadrappa, (1963 Mys 115) above.[81]

In a case for divorce by the 2nd husband under the Hindu Marriage Act on the ground that on the date of his marriage the respondent's husband was living the respondent contended that her first husband was not heard of for over 7 years and should therefore be deemed to be dead under Section 108, of the Act; it was held that the presumption even if raised, could only mean that he was dead on the date of the petition i.e., 11-11-76 and would not relate back to the marriage i.e., 24-5-1970 that since the husband by the first marriage who was alive in 1960 was presumed to be not dead on 24-5-1970 by the application of the rule under Section 107, in the absence of proof of death the marriage with the petitioner was null and void.[82] But under Section 13(7) of the Hindu Marriage Act of 1955, and Section 27(h) of the Special Marriage Act of 1954 it is specifically provided as a ground for divorce if the person had not been heard of for seven or more years by those who would naturally have heard of him if he was alive. There is a similar provision in Section 14(3) of the Matrimonial Causes Act 1965 in England.[83]

inheritence he must be deemed to have died at the date of his disappearance is a rule of evidence only and is superseded by this section.[84]

The rule of Mohammaden Law that a missing person is to be regarded as alive till the expiry of ninety years from the date of his birth is overruled by this section.[85]

So is the rule of Hindu Law that twelve years must elapse before an absent person of whom nothing has been heard during this period, can be presumed to be dead.

Where the plaintiff claimed under Mohammaden Law a share in his grandfather's estate the onus is on him to show either by establishing a presumption under the Indian Evidence Act, Section 108, or by actual evidence that his father's death occurred at a date subsequent to that of the deceased owner; otherwise he is excluded by the children of the deceased living at his death as being earlier in degree.[86]

Sections 107 and 108 provide a uniform rule for Hindus and also for Mohammadns, and supersede the rules contained in Hindu and Muslim Laws.[87]

6. PLEADINGS AND PROOF

The benefit of Section 108 is not available when the plea is neither raised not proved.[88]

Before a presumption under Section 108 is raised an appropriate enquiry is to be held and it is permissible to show that the allegation that a person has not been heard of for over 7 years is not true and there is evidence to show that he is alive, or has been heard of within that period.

Unless it is established that the whereabouts of a person are not known and he has not been heard of for the past 7 years before the date of the suit, the presumption would be that he is alive.[89]

In an ejectment suit by one of the joint lessors alleging that the co-lessor had died in or about 1954, it was held that it was not proved, that the co-lessor had not been heard of for seven years on the date when the second appeal was heard and decided, by those persons who would have heard of him if he had been alive, that as long as that was not proved, the provisions of Section 108 did not become applicabe, and the case has to be decided not by applying Section 108 but by applying Section 107.[90]

Where A stated that he and another B are monthly joint tenants under a landlord of a certain premises, it was held that it must be regarded as an admission on the part of A that B is alive and not that he is dead; that so Section 108 is ruled out and Section 107 is attracted and A must prove that B is dead.[91]

No suit lies for a declaration that a person who was not heard of for over 7 years is deemed to be dead.[92]

On which date within the period of seven years, a person has died is not a matter of presumption but of evidence and onus of proving that the death took place at any particular time lies upon the person who claims a right to the establishment of which that fact is essential.[93]

7. SECTION 108 NOT EXHAUSTIVE

Section 108 is not exhaustive on the question of presumption as regards the death of a person. The court may in the circumstance of a case make a suitable presumption even regarding the time of death of the person concerned.[94]

The presumption is not rigid and may be proved before lapse of seven years from proof of special circumstance, e.g., where a deceased has been exposed it specific perils of death.[95]

8. SIMULTANEOUS DEATH

When two individuals perish in a common calamity (e.g. ship wreck, train collision, air crash, earthquake, etc.) and the question arises who died first in the absence of evidence on the point, there is no presumption in law that the younger survived the elder. Such a question is always from first to last a pure question of fact, the onus probandi lying on the party who asserts the affirmative.[96]

9. KIDNAPPING

Where during the pendency of the first appeal the plaintiff/respondent was kidnapped and the appeal was allowed against him in his absence, his wife and children were allowed to file the second appeal without waiting for seven years in the ends of justice.[97]

Burden of proof as to relationship in the cases of partners, landlord and tenant, principal and agent.

S. 109. When the question is whether persons are partners, landlord and tenant, or principal and agent, and it has been shown that they have been acting as such, the burden of proving that they do not stand, or have ceased to stand, to each other in those relationships respectively, is on the person who affirms it.

COMMENTS

1. PRINCIPLE AND SCOPE

This section deals with presumption in case of relationship of partners in a partnership, landlord and tenant, or principal and agent. When the existence of a personal relationship, or a state of things, is once established by proof, the law presumes that the relationship or state of things continues to exist as before, till the contrary is shown, or till a different presumption is raised, from the nature of the subject in question. A partnership tenancy, or agency, once shown to exist, is presumed to continue, till it is proved to have been dissolved.

Cases other than the three cases mentioned in this section are covered by the general presumption under Section 114(d) of the Act.

GARTH C.J. observed "This is a principle upon which the courts and the Legislature have generally thought it right to act, as in cases of presumption, and in presuming that a tenancy or partnership or other state of things continue till the contrary is proved". The learned judge was dealing with a case of an admitted private partition and the members of the family acted upon that partition for several years. It was held that the onus was upon the plaintiffs who wants to disturb the existing state of things to show the arrangement under which the private partition was determined.[1]

2. PARTNERS

Where a partner is to be made liable, the plaintiff should prove that such a person is a partner and continues to be a partner or has been acting as a partner of the firm.[2]

Partnership once shown to exist is presumed to continue until the contrary is proved.[3]

After a firm is dissolved, the partners continue to be liable to third parties for any act done which would have been an act of the firm if done before the dissolution, until public notice of dissolution is given (s. 45, Indian Partnership Act, 1932).

When the question is whether persons concerned are partners and it has been shown that they had been acting as such, the presumption under this section is that the appellant who is one of such persons and who has been acting as a partner, is in fact a partner in the firm and that he continues to be such; the burden of proving that they are not partners or they had ceased to be partners is on the person who says that he was not a partner or had ceased to be a partner.[4]

3. 'LANDLORD AND TENANT'

Where the relationship of landlord and tenant is admitted or proved to exist, it will be presumed to continue until it is shown by affirmative proof that it has ceased to exist. Mere non-payment of rent, though for many years, is not sufficient to show that such relationship had ceased.[5] Where it was shown that there was a relationship of landlord and tenant it is for the party to prove that such relationship ceased to exist.[6]

In the case of an agricultural tenancy, it was held that where there was no proof of actual possession by the landlord, the continuance of tenancy by holding over is to be presumed, entitling the tenants to occupancy rights.[7]

Where a tenant was continuing in possession without the landlord's consent, it was held that he would not be a tenant holding over, but he would be a tenant by sufferance; if acceptance of rent would constitute implied assent of the landlord, it would have the effect of renewing the lease and not continuing the original lease.[8]

Where a suit was filed by a tenant against landlord for possession of premises on the ground of illegal eviction and when both parties adduced evidence, it was held that the question of onus of proof was immaterial.[9]

4. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT

Where an authority to do an act is once shown to exist, it is presumed to continue until the contrary is proved. Section 182-238 of the Indian Contract Act deal with the relationship of principal and agent. Section 206 provides that a reasonable notice must be given of revocation or renunciation of agency. Section 208 provides for when the authority of an agent is terminated. Once the relationship of principal and agent, is shown to exist the burden of proving that it has ceased is on the person who asserts it.[10]

When two principals appoint an agent in respect of a matter in which they are jointly interested and if one of the principals dies, the death of one terminates the authority not merely in respect of the deceased, but also in respect of the other living principals.[11] Where an agent was appointed by several principals and one of the principals died, the agency continues under the surviving principals unless the principals were joint principals and not joint and several principals, and unless the power given to the agent was not joint and several. In such cases if the agent pleads that the entire agency has terminated, it is for him to prove under Section 109 by producing the document i.e. the power of attorney or by secondary evidence, that the principals were joint principal's.[12]

Under the Hindu Law there is a presumption that a family was joint and it must be shown that the same character was determined by division.[13]

COMMENTS

1. PRINCIPLE AND SCOPE

This section says that when a person is shown to be in possession of some property, the burden of proving that he is not the owner of such property is on the person who affirms it. This is based on the well known principle that possession is prima facie proof of ownership. The object of this provision is to allow a person who is in possession of property to continue in possession till some other party proves his title to it, thereby achieving the object of preventing other persons from committing breaches of peace by taking the law into their own hands. With the very same object Section 6 of the Specific Relief Act, 1963 and Section 145, Cr PC, were enacted.

This section gives effect to the principle that possession is prima facie evidence of complete title: anyone who intends to oust the possessor must establish a right to do so.[14] This is to be presumed from lawful possession until the want of title or a better title is proved.[15]

A person in possession of land without title has an interest in the property which is heritable and good against all the world except the true owner, an interest which unless and until the true owner interferes, is capable of being disposed of by deed or will, or by execution sale just in the same way as it could be dealt with if the title were unimpeachable.[16]

Where a vendor of immovable property sues for possession his vendor not having been in prosession at the time of the suit, it lies upon him to show that his vendor was in possession at some period within twelve years prior to the date of the suit.[17]

The application was rejected and the shop was sold in execution and bought by P the defendant N then brought his suit against P to establish his title. It was held that the plaintiff having proved his possession at the date of the execution sale it lay upon P who claimed the property to prove a title in himself or in the judgement debtor A and that he having failed to do this, the plaintiff was entitled to a decree declaratory of his right to the property as against the defendant.[18]

2. ENGLISH LAW

The English Doctrine of Possessory Title is based on equitable considerations to see that a person having long possession of the property is not disturbed by any wrong doer. COCKBORN C.J., observed "I take it as clearly established that possession is good against all the world except the person who can show a good title."[19]

This was followed in Perry v. Clissold[20] wherein it was stated that "It cannot be disputed that a person in possession of land in the assumed character of owner and exercising peaceably the ordinary rights of ownership has a perfectly good title against all the world but the rightful owner".

In another case Glenwood L.C. Ltd. v. Phillips[21] it was held that it is a well-established that possession is good against a wrong doer and the latter cannot plead justteritii.[22]

3. INDIAN LAW

Under Section 6 of Specific Relief Act (47 of 1963) provides that a person who has been in possession of property, if dispossessed should file a suit for possession within six months of dispossession. In that case the person who files the suit need not necessarily have title to it.

The Privy Council has laid down in a case, in which the plaintiff was a purchaser in possession and the defendant had no title at all, that lawful possession of land is sufficient evidence of right as owner, as against a person who has no title whatever, and who is a mere trespasser. The former can obtain a declaratory decree and an injunction against the wrongdoer.[23] In that case the plaintiff was in possession when he brought his suit and he asked for a decree declaring his right, and an injunction restraining the defendant from disturbing his possession. The Privy Council observed (Pages 106, 107 of 20 Indian Appeals), "The possession of the plaintiff was sufficient evidence of title as owner against the defendant. By Section 9 of the (old) Specific Relief Act (Act 1 of 1877), if the Plaintiff had been dispossessed otherwise than in due course of law, he could, by a suit instituted within six months from the date of the dispossession, have recovered possession, notwithstanding any other title that might be set up in such suit. If he could thus recover possession from a person who might be able to prove a title, it is certainly right and just that he should be able, against a person who has no title and is a mere wrongdoer, to obtain a declaration of title as owner, and an injunction to restrain the wrongdoer from interfering with his possession."

It is not necessary for a person claiming injunction to prove his title to the suit land provided he proves that he was in lawful possession until he was dispossessed by the defendant who had no title.[24]

4. PRESUMPTION UNDER THE SECTION

The presumption of title under Section 110 from possession can arise only where facts disclose no title in any other party.[25]

Where there is proof of long possession, it would constitute prima facie proof of title in the person having possession and it is for the other party to displace that presumption[26] but the burden is on the person claiming adverse possession to establish the identity and extent of the suit property.[27] Section 110 embodies a well-recognised principle that possession is prima facie proof of ownership; it does not make any distinction between the Government and a private citizen. It is equally applicable where a Government claims to be the owner and challenges the ownership of a person who is in possession of the property.[28]

The plaintiffs sued the Government for a declaration that a certain piece of land belonged to them and that they might be confirmed in their possession, alleging that they had purchased the site for Rs. 20 in 1888 from one D whose father had mortgaged it for Rs. 20 to the plaintiffs' father. It was held that the possession of the plaintiffs being peaceable and having been obtained without ousting anyone, it was of such a character as to attract the presumption described in this section and was good against the whole world except the person who could show a better title, and that, as the Government had failed to establish their title to the land plaintiffs were lawfully entitled to its possession.[29]

Where a portion of a house is proved to be in possession of a person for a long time a presumption of ownership of that portion arises in his favour.[30]

The presumption of ownership contained in this section would arise only if two conditions are satisfied:—(1) That the possession of the plaintiff is not prima facie wrongful i.e., his possession must have a lawful origin. (2) The other party has not proved his title to the property in question.[31]

Mere acts of user will not lead to a presumption of title in case the possession is prima facie not proved to be lawful. When the possession of the plaintiff is referable to a sale certificate issued by the executing court, it is prima facie lawful in origin, and the presumption arising in favour of the municipality u/s. 36(h) of the Indor Municipal Act was held to be displaced.[32] When it is shown that a person has been in possession since a long time and his possession is of lawful origin and the opposite party cannot prove any superior title, the person in possession, is entitled to a decree for possession, if he is dispossessed. (though his suit is not under Section 9 of the (old) Specific Relief Act.[33]

This rule applies both to immovable and movable property.[34] Where property was seized by the police from the possession of some known persons, it should be delivered to such persons without resorting to the procedure prescribed for proclamation under Ss. 457(2) and 458, Cr.P.C. as the presumption under Section 110 of the Evidence Act arises.[35]

Where A is proved to be in possession of a disputed quantity of pepper at the relevant time the presumption is that he is the owner. The burden of proving that he is not the owner is on the person who asserts it.[36]

Where night soil was collected by sweepers of a Municipal Board and deposited on a leased land, it was held that the ownership in the night soil deposited on the leased land must be deemed to be in the Municipal Board.[37]

The presumption applies only to ownership and not to adverse possession. When the title is not in dispute, this section has no application.[38]

The term 'possession' in this section is to be understood as opposed to juridical possession and to denote actual present possession.

Possession to be proved must be such possesion as the property is capable of the normal method of user.[39] The proof of possession varies with the nature of property under the scrutiny of Courts and it can be proved by credible oral evidence as well.[40]

In a suit to establish ownership over Government land by adverse possession, it was held that though from evidence of exclusive user, possession may be inferred, evidence of mere user by tethering cattle is not evidence of possession, much less of adverse possession and Section 110 is not attracted.[41] The plea of adverse possession has to be raised before the original authority and not for the first time at appeal or revision stage.[42] Where the presumption is that the ownership of salt land vests in the Govt., there arises no question of applying the presumption under this section.[43]

In the case of waste and jungle land where there would be nothing except self-grown trees or wild grass, the possession which the plaintiff has to prove must be adequate in continuity, and in publicity and adverse to the opponent.[44] In the case of waste or jungle lands it was held that payment of land tax may be sufficient evidence of possession, as being the only practicable act of dominion.[45] However it was held that land revenue receipts do not ipso facto prove actual possession of land.[46]

Where in a Pahani Patrak the name of one X was shown in the column "cultivators" for some years and the same column was left blank in subsequent years, it was held that the presumption is that X continued in possession in the subsequent years also and that there is no warrant for assuming that the onwer re-entered into possession in those years.[47]

There was a conflict of opinion between the High Courts as to whether a plaintiff in a suit for possession of immovable property, other than a suit under Section 9 of the (old) Specific Relief Act (1 of 1877), is entitled to succeed merely upon proof of previous possession and dispossession by the defendant within twelve years prior to the suit, or whether he is bound to prove title. A Full Bench of the Bombay High Court held that possession is good title against all persons except the rightful owner, and entitles the possessor to maintain ejectment against any person other than such owner who dispossesses him.[48] A person, although suing more than six months after the date of dispossession and without resorting to a possessory suit,[49] is entitled to rely on the possession previous to his dispossession as against a person who has no title.[50] The view of the Bombay High Court is in accordance with the English law. The effect of the Bombay cases is that when there is wrongful ouster of the person in possession, the person who comes into Court to oust such tort-feasor need not prove more than his possession of the land in dispute, and that he had been ousted by the defendant, and that the plaintiff's prior possession was prima facie evidence of his title. According to this view, it is not necessary to show title in the absence of any title shown by the defendant. The word 'possession' denotes actual present possession. JENKINS, C.J. said: "To say that a possession is not within the meaning of Section 110, unless it is a possession according to title, would be to render that section meaningless, and to introduce a doctrine subversive of the established principles of property law."[51] But RANADE J., struck a different note: "Under Section 110, possession, when long and continued up to a recent date, leads to a presumption of title. Where the conflict is between mere previous possession and recent actual possession, the fact of previous possession will not entitle plaintiff to a decree except in suits under Section 9, (old) Specific Relief Act (1 of 1877), brought within six months from dispossession. Where this period is exceeded before a suit is brought, and is less than the limitation law requires, he must make out a prima facie title...And Section 110 (Evidence Act) refers to the presumption to be made of ownership based on the circumstance of such possession, and allows the plaintiff with such prima facie title to claim a decree where no superior title is proved on the other side. It is in reference to such cases that it has been held that possession is evidence of title, and the plaintiff who proves such possession and subsequent disturbance, shifts the burden of proof on the defendant when the prima facie title is made out....Where no such title is made out, and plaintiff comes to the court and asks for a declaratory decree, he cannot obtain that decree on the mere ground that he was in possession and the defendant had no title. Mere wrongful possession is insufficient to shift the burden of proof.[52] This means that possession must be such a character as leads to a presumption of title.[53] A suit on a possessory title must be distinguished from a suit filed under S. 6 of the Specific Relief Act, 1963, within six months of dispossession. The latter type of suit cannot be resisted on the ground of title, so that the suit can be maintained even against a true owner if he has dispossessed the plaintiff otherwise than in due course of law. A suit on possessory title, on the other hand, can be filed within twelve years of dispossession (Art 64 of the Limitation Act, 1963) and the plaintiff can maintain it against any person who does not have a better title.[54]

The Calcutta High Court held that mere previous possession will not entitle a plaintiff to a decree for the recovery of possession except in a suit under S. 9 of the (old) Specific Relief Act.[55] In a suit to recover possession brought more than six months after the date of dispossession, the plaintiff must prove title, and mere previous possession for any period short of the statutory period of twelve years cannot be suffficient for the purpose.[56] In a suit for recovery of possession based on the plaintiff's possessory title, the burden of proof lies on the plaintiff to prove his legal possession within 12 years, if proved the burden shifts to the defendant to prove that he is entitled to retain the possession on the basis of better title.[57] Thus, in cases other than possessory suits under the Specific Relief Act the plaintiff must show title or such adverse possession as confers a title under the Limitation Act. The Calcutta High Court in Nishachand v. Kanchiram, (ILR 26 Cal 579) purported to follow the decision of the Privy Council in Wise v. Ameerunnissa, (6 CLR 249 : 7 IA 73 (PC)) which in holding that mere previous possession for any period within 12 years will not entitle a plaintiff to a decree for possession in a suit brought more than 6 months time after dispossession, even if the defendant could not establish any title to the disputed land. In Satish v. Madan[58] the court expressed doubt about Nishachand v. Kanchiram, (ILR 26 Cal 579) and held that a person in peaceful possession of land though not able to explain his title, will be entitle to recover possession by ejecting a trespasser.[59]

The Madras High Court has held that, as against a wrong-doer, prior possession of the plaintiff in an action of ejectment is sufficient title, even if the suit be brought more than six months after the act of dispossession complained of, and the wrong-doer cannot successfully resist the suit by showing that the title and right to possession are in a third person. It is immaterial however short or recent the plaintiff's possession was.

A suit to recover certain plots of land which were reformed after diluvion was filed basing on the title by prescription. Their Lordships of the Privy Council held that plaintiff cannot succeed as he did not file the suit under Section 9 of the (old) Specific Relief Act, within 6 months of dispossession.[60]

SUBRAMANIYA IYYAR J., observed in Mustafa Saheb v. Santha, ILR 23 Mad 176, that the observation of the Privy Council in Wise v. Ameerunnissa's (6 CLR 249 (PC) case should be read in conjunction with the finding given in that case namely, that the defendants became entitled to the land under a settlement with the government, to whom the land belonged and so the plaintiff could not recover on the strength of the previous possession except in a suit filed under Section 9 of the (old) Specific Relief Act. The same view was taken in Krishnarao v. Vasude[61] & Sahodra v. Gobardhan[62]; Mahabeer v. M; as per Garth C.J.[63]

The Allahabad High Court held that S. 9 of the (old) Specific Relief Act does not debar a person who has been ousted by a treaspasser from the possession of immovable property to which he has merely a possessory title, from bringing a suit in ejectment on his possessory title after the lapse of six months from the date of his dispossession.[64]

The Patna High Court held that a plaintiff who has omitted to sue under S. 9 of the (old) Specific Relief Act, when first dispossessed, is not debarred from relying, in a suit for ejectment, on this section. As soon as he has proved that the defendant has dispossessed him the onus is thrown upon the latter to prove his title.[65] It was held by Patna High Court that if a person's original entry into the land was on an ostensibly lawful basis on origin and if he is forcibly dispossessed by any trespasser or a wrongdoer, the person who was dispossessed would be entitled to a decree for possession taking the aid of Section 110 of the Evidence Act, without being called upon to negative the defect of his title.[66]

In POLLOCK & MULLA'S CONTRACT ACT (7th Ed. P. 659) it is observed "It is submitted that the correct view is the one taken by Bombay, Allahabad & Madras Courts in accordance with the English doctrine as now settled, and that the present Section 9 of Specific Relief Act, cannot be held to take away any remedy available to a party on the strength of his previous possession."

The question is now concluded by the decision of the Supreme Court holding that a regular suit basing on prior possession without proof of title is maintainable against all persons who do not have title to the property.[67]

The Supreme Court held in a suit for ejectment that prior possession of the plaintiff is sufficient title and the wrongdoer cannot resist the suit by showing that the title and right to possession are in a third person. He can only resist by showing a superior title in himself.[68]

COMMENTS

1. PRINCIPLE

This section deals with proof of good faith in a transaction between the parties, where one of the parties is in a position of active confidence of the other. The two illustrations explain the scope of this section.

A person who challenges the validity of a transaction on the ground of fraud, undue influence, etc., and alleges bad faith on the part of his opponent has to prove such allegations under Section 101 of this Act. An exception to this rule is the case of a person who stands in the position of active confidence to the other.

The words 'good faith' indicate that the relationship between the parties must be such that one is bound to protect the interests of the other. This had been held to apply to a trustee, an executor, an administrator, a guardian, an agent, a minister of religion, a medical attendant, an auctioneer, and attorney. Persons standing in a confidential relation towards others cannot entitle themselves to hold benefits which those others may have conferred upon them unless they can show to the satisfaction of the court that the person by whom the benefits have been conferred had competent and independent advice in conferring them.[70]

Though the illustrations refer only to instances of a lawyer and a client and a father and a child, this section applies to other cases also where one stands in a confidential relationship with the other whereby his predominating influence exists. This section applies especially to the case of pardanashin ladies.

The principle of the rule embodied in this section which was called "the great rule of the Court" is that "He who bargains in a matter of advantage with a person placing confidence in him is bound to show, that a reasonable use has been made of that confidence. The rule applies to trustees, attorneys, or any one else."[71]

Where a fiduciary or quasi-fiduciary relationship exists, the burden of sustaining a transaction between the parties rests with the party who stands in such relation and is benefited by it. The plaintiff having been entirely in the hands of the defendant, would be destitute of the means of proving affirmatively, the mala fides of the transaction; whilst the defendant in such a transaction may fairly be subjected to the duty not only of dealing honestly but of preserving clear evidence that he has done so (Markby). In such cases it is seldom, if ever, possible to prove specific acts of deception, or of exercise of authority amounting to moral coercion. Yet, the risk of abuse is obviously great. The law therefore reverses its usual rule of evidence in dealings between man and man. Commonly we do not presume, without specific indications, that there is anything contrary to good faith in transactions which on the face of them are regular.... But this is the rule as between equals, persons who are capable of dealing with one another, as the accustomed forensic phrase goes, "at arm's length". When one party habitually looks up to the other and is guided by him, he can no longer be supposed capable, without special precautions, of exercising that independent judgement which is requisite for his consent to be free. (Pollock's Law of Fraud in British India, pp. 63-64).

Section 16 of the Contract Act deals with cases where one of the parties is in a position to dominate the Will of the other and if he makes use of that position to obtain an unfair advantage, it can be challenged. Section 16(2)(a) of the Contract Act gives an example of a person who is in a position to dominate the Will of the other, by stating "standing in a fiduciary relation to the other". Secton 16(3) states that the burden of proof is on the person who is in a dominating position, when the transaction appears to be unconscionable.

The Supreme Court held that Section 16(1) of the Contract Act, lays down the principle in general terms whereas Sub-section (2) lays down that a presumption of undue influence is deemed to arise if the conditions set out therein are fulfilled; that Sub-sec. (3) lays down the conditions for raising a rebuttable presumption that a transaction is procured by the exercise of undue influence; the reason being that a person who has obtained an advantage over another by dominating his Will, may also remain in a position to suppress the requisite evidence in support of the plea of unde influence.[72]

The Courts of Equity in England place the burden of sustaining the transaction on the party benefited by it, where fiduciary relationship existed. The party has to show that the relationship was of unobjectionable character.[73]

There is no fiduciary relationship between a grandfather and a grandson. When a grandfather impeaches the trnasaction he must give particulars of undue influence in sufficient detail, and he must prove that the grandson was in a position to dominate his Will.[74]

Under Section 16(3) of the Contract Act, the burden is on the person who is in a dominating position when the transaction appears on the face of it or on the evidence, to be unconscionable. It must be shown that the dominating position was used to the detriment of the other person.[75]

2. GOOD FAITH

Section 111 applies where the validity of the transaction which is otherwise valid in all respects, is called in question on the ground that the person benefiting from it did not act in good faith or took advantage of his position. In a case where one party alleges that the other executed a promissory note in consideration of a debt and the other denies execution and alleges that the document itself is a forged one, Section 111 ordinarily has no application.[76]

3. ACTIVE CONFIDENCE

Where three sisters (defendants) executed a pronote in favour of the first defendant's husband (plaintiff) for services rendered in managing their joint estate the Privy Council held that it appeared from the circumstances that the first defendant (eldest sister) was in a position to influence her younger sisters and the onus of proving good faith was on the plaintiff.[77] Where an old woman depending entirely for food, clothes, and management of her property executed a gift in favour of the nephew it was held, it was sufficient to raise a presumption of influence over her and the burden was on the donee to prove that the act was spontaneous.[78] It was held that in a case of gift the donee should prove that the donor really understood and intended to execute the deed, but it was not necessary to prove that the donor took independent advice.[79] Where the plaintiff who was old, infirm, weak and having none to look after him, executed a deed of gift in favour of his brother's grandson believing it to be a deed of Will and he executed it at the request of the grandson; it was held that the burden is on the grandson to prove that the gift was not induced by undue influence.[80] Where the transaction appears on the face of it to be unconscionable the burden lies on the person benefited by the transaction to prove that the transaction was not induced by undue influence.[81] The burden is on the person who is in position of dominating to show that there was no unde influence.[82]

Where fraud, misrepresentation, or undue influence is alleged by a party in a suit, normally, the burden is on the person who alleges it to prove the same. But, when a person is in a fiduciary relationship and in a position of active confidence, in regard to an illiterate woman, the burden of proving the absence of fraud, mis-representation or undue influence, is upon the person in the dominating position; he has to prove good faith and fair play in the transaction and that it is a genuine and bona fide one. When the party complaining shows fiduciary relation, the law presumes everything against the transaction and the onus is cast upon the person holding the position of confidence or trust to show that the trnasaction is perfectly fair and reasonable.[83]

An agent entrusted with the management of an estate is in the position of active confidence of his principal and the burden of proving good faith is on the agent or on the person who claims through him. In such cases the presumption against the transaction, is rebuttable.[84]

Where the impugned deed was executed by the plaintiff soon after he attained majority in favour of his maternal uncle (defendant) who was acting as the de facto guardian during the minority of the plaintiff, and there was no specific denial of the allegation in the plaint about the fiduciary relationship between the parties, it was held that the burden of proving good faith was on the defendant.[85]

4. BORROWINGS

Mere fact that a person was in need of money cannot be held that the money lender was in a position to dominate the Will of the borrower.[86] However, the helpless condition of a borrower may result in exercising undue influence by a money lender.[87] Where exorbitant rate of interest was stipulated and the borrower did not realise the real nature of the transaction, it was held it is sufficient to make out a case of undue influence.[88]

5. TRUSTEE

In the case of a transaction of purchase by a person occupying fiduciary position as in the case of trustee and beneficiary and the transaction is by the beneficiary whose interests are adversely affected, the purchaser trustee must show that there has been no fraud and there was no unjust enrichment in his favour and he acted in good faith.[89]

6. SOLICITOR AND CLIENT

Where a mortgage was executed by a person in favour of his pleader's son, it was held that the mortgagee was not one who stood in a position of active confidence of the mortgagor. A mortgage between a solicitor and a client should not ordinarily be scrutinized with the same care as in the case of gift or a sale at undervalue from the client. Merely because a clause was inserted in the mortgage deed fixing time, and the amount of payment by the mortgagor, it cannot be said to constitute an unfair advantage on the part of the mortagagee of mortgagor's position.[90]

Where a client made a gift in favour of his lawyer's wife as a token of gratitude, it was held that it was far from being an improvident act and as the transaction bore the stamp of righteousness and naturalness. It would show that it was spontaneous and valid.[91]

7. INSOLVENCY

Under the Provincial Insolvency Act, the burden lies on the insolvent to prove the exception provided in Section 42(1)(a) of that Act, viz., that the transaction is a bona fide transaction.[92]

8. PARDANASHIN LADIES

In the case of deeds and powers executed by pardanashin ladies, it is requisite, that those who rely upon them should satisfy the court that they had been explained to, and understood by those who executed them.[93] In the case of a pardanashin lady the law throws around her a special coak of protection. It demands that the burden of proof shall in such a case rest not with those who attack, but with those who found upon a deed executed by her, and the proof must go so far as to show affirmatively and conclusively that the deed was not only executed, but was explained to and was really understood by her.[94]

The expression "pardanashin" is not to be confused with a lady observing pardah. The word has special legal significance and means one who is unable to understand the transaction by virtue of the manner in which she has been brought up.[95]

A Pardanashin lady accused will not be exempted from personal attendance in court as a matter of right. But at the same time the court must reasonably use the discretion of granting such exemption under Section 205 of the Criminal Procedure Code, 1973, after due consideration of all the attending circumstances including the social status, custom and practice of the accused as well as the necessity of her personal presence having regard to the nature of the offence and the stage of the trial. No strict test as to the pardanashin status can be laid down, and non-observance of rigidity with regard to pardah, e.g. attending social and religious functions or going to bathe in the river, etc. with veils on would not take the accused out of that category. The court is to be guided by the prevailing habits and customs.[1]

As illiterate and rustic village woman is entitled to the same benefits as are available to a pardanashin. In the case of an old woman suffering from infirmity, ignorance, illiteracy, mental deficiency, inexperience and dependence upon others, intended to create a wakf and not a sale, it was held that a heavy burden of proof lay upon those who alleged it to be sale.[2]

Similar burden lay upon those who dealt with a person suffering from apparent mental or physical incapacity.[3]

The Privy Council held that where there was a relation of confidentiality between the parties, and where a person who was in a position to dominate the Will of a pardanashin lady had obtained a deed in his favour and the deed showed on its face to be harsh and unconscionable, the person benefited by the deed had to rebut the presumption in such circumstances against the deed.[4] The Privy Council held that "the onus is on the party who relies on a deed executed by a pardanashin lady to satisfy the court that it had been explained to and understood by her before the execution or after it, showing that she adopted the deed with full knowledge and comprehension. That the disposition must be substantially understood and must really be the mental act, as its execution is the physical act of the person who makes it.[5] In all cases where the document is executed by a pardanashin lady, it should be shown by the person who obtained the deed that the transaction is fair and equitable and it was explained to her and she understood the meaning and effect of the instrument she was executing.[6] In some cases it was held that for upholding the transaction it had to be proved that the contents of the document are fair and equitable and it was explained to her and that she knew and understood the meaning and also the effect of the contents of the instrument she was executing.[7] Where the legal adviser of a pardanashin woman obtained a mortgage deed for the money he advanced to the lady, it was held that such transaction should be examined with close scrutiny and the court should insist on the mortgagee to show that the transaction was fully understood by the mortgagor and was a fair and honest transaction.[8]

For rebutting the presumption mere adducing proof that legal advice or independent advice was taken is not sufficient, but it must further show that it was acted upon by the pardanashin lady.[9] In the case of sales or gifts executed by pardanashin ladies, the person whether a purchaser or a donee must show conclusively that the transaction was honest and bona fide and the lady had some independent advice before execution of the document.[10] If the contents of the documents are intricate they must be adequately explained and the degree of intelligence of the lady would be a material factor to be considered whether she understood the meaning and effect of those contents, though independent legal advice is not in itself essential.[11]

Even in cases where a pardanashin lady had independent advice the court will scrutinize the transaction very closely to see that it is a fair one.[12] Even if it is established that the lady had an intellegent understanding of the deed, still the question of undue influence may arise, depending on the facts of the case, in view of the relationship between the donor and the donee.[13] Even if there is proof showing absence of undue influence, ignorance of the contents of the deed or the effect of the contents may be sufficient to invalidate the deed.[14]

Her free and intelligent consent to a transaction is necessary.[15]

The rule of special protection to a pardanashin, old and illiterate woman should not be applied in each and every case but should be applied in the light of the facts of each case.[16]

The transactions entered into with a pardanashin lady fall broadly into two groups: namely, (1) cases where the person who seeks to hold the lady to the terms of her deed is one who stood towards her in a fiduciary character or in some relation of personal confidence; and (2) cases where a person as an absolute stranger and dealt with her at arm's length. In the former class of cases the court will act with great caution and will presume confidence put and influence exerted; in the latter class of cases the court will require the confidence and influence to be proved intrinsically. In all these cases the fairness of the bargain is the crucial test.[17]

9. ILLITERATE PERSON—NON EST FACTUM

Common Law defence of non est factum to actions on specialities in its original was available where an illiterate person, to whom the contents of a deed had been wrongly read, executed it under a mistake as to its nature and contents, he could say that it was not his deed at all. In its modern application, the doctrine has been extended to cases other than those of illiteracy and to other contracts in writing. In most of the cases in which this defence was pleaded the mistake was induced by fraud; but that was not, perhaps a necessary factor, where fraud exists, but on the ground that the mind of the signor did not accompany the signature; in other words, that he never intended to sign, and therefore, in contemplation of law never did sign, the contract to which his name is appended.

In Foster v. Mackinnon[18] the defendant was inducted to endorse a bill of exchange on the false representation that it was a guarantee similar to one he had signed on a previous occasion. He was not liable when sued even by an innocent endorsee of the bill. BYLES, J. said :

> "..... the defendant never intended to sign that contract or any such contract. He never intended to put his name to any instrument that was or thereafter might become negotiable. He was deceived, not merely as to its the legal effect but as to the 'actual contents' of the instrument."

In Chitty on 'Contracts' 25th Edition—Vol. 1, General Principles, in Chapter 5, under Section 343 (at pages 194 and 195), the learned author says :

> "The law on this subject was completely reviewed and restated by the House of Lords in Saunders v. Anglio Building Society[19] and the distinction between the character or nature of a document and the contents of the document was rejected as unsatisfactory. It was stressed that the defence of non est factum was not lightly to be allowed where a person of full age and capacity had signed a written document embodying contractual terms. But it was nevertheless held that in exceptional circumstances the plea was available so long as the person signing the document had made a fundamental mistake as to the character or effect of the document. Their Lordships appear to have concentrated on the disparity between the effect of the document actually signed and the document as it was believed to be (rather than the nature of the mistake) stressing that the disparity must be "radical", "essential", "fundamental" or "very substantial."

In Foster v. Mackinnon,[20] the action was by the endorsee of a bill of exchange. The defendant pleaded that he endorsed the bill on a fraudulent representation by the acceptor that he was signing a guarantee. He was held not liable. In holding that such a plea was admissible, the Court observed :

It (signature) is invalid not merely on the ground of fraud, where fraud exists, but on the ground that the mind of the signor did not accompany the signature; in other was, that he never intended to sign ..... He was deceived, not merely as to the legal effect, but as to the 'actual contents' of the instrument. A contract or other transaction induced or tendered by fraud is not void, but only voidable at the option of the party defrauded. The transaction remains valid until it was avoided.[21] The legal position will be different if there is a fraudulent misrepresentation not merely as to the contents of the document but as to its character. With reference to fraudulent misrepresentation as to character, it has been held that the transaction is void and with reference to contents, it is merely voidable.[22] Where the executant was under a bona fide belief that she was executing a gift-deed only but in fact two documents were got executed by her, one a gift deed and another a sale-deed. It was a case of fraudulent misrepresentation as to the character of document executed by her and not merely as to its contents or as to its legal effect. She never intended to enter into the contract to which she unknowingly became a party. Her mind did not accompany her thumb impression. It was held to be a totally void transaction.[23]

In a case an illiterate old father wanted to executed a will in respect to his property in favour of his son who took his father's signature on a partition deed before the Sub-Registrar by showing the properties to be joint family properties. The father signed the document in good faith. The document was unusually attested by seven witnesses including one utter stranger not known to both the parties. Most of the witnesses did not see executant signing the document. As a result of the deed the son got the entire property which he sold off and also drove his old father out of his house. All these made clear that a fiticious deed was brought into existence. The lower appellate Court held that the document was non est and void. The second appeal was dismissed holding that the father could sue for the declaration of title and recovery of possession without praying for setting aside the partition.[24] Where the sole witness the scribe of a sale-deed, executed by an illiterate lady, made no statement that the contents of the document were read out and explained to her and there was no other direct or circumstantial evidence in respect of it, it was held that due execution of the document was not proved and the document was invalid.[25]

10. LITERATES

In the case of a literate woman with considerable intellectual capacity and habits having dealings with another persons, it was held that no presumption would arise that the person stood in a position of active confidence to her.[26]

11. BLIND

Mere signature of a blind person on the sale-deed cannot have any force. Where an illiterate and blind woman is alleged to have executed a sale-deed, the execution of which is denied by her, a heavy burden is laid on the purchaser to prove that she not only agreed to sell but she knew what was being written and the document was in accordance with the terms of the agreement.[27]

12. HUSBAND AND WIFE

The Privy Council held that where an illiterate wife mortgaged her properties for the benefit for her husband who was managing her properties, the presumption of undue influence would arise.[28]

A film actress filed a suit for declaration of title on the ground that the conveyance deed was signed by her without being aware of the nature of the document. It was held that though the plaintiff and the defendant were living together as wife and husband, as her case was not that she was unable to resist the defendant in getting the property from her, the suit can be taken as based on fraud and not on undue influence. In the absence of particulars of fraud, plaintiff cannot succeed.[29]

13. SPIRITUAL ADVISER AND DISCIPLE

Where a gift was made by a pardanashin lady in favour of her priest, it was set aside on the ground of undue influence.[30]

In a suit for cancellation of a deed of gift executed by the plaintiff in favour of the defendant, the plaintiff was well advanced in years, and the defendant was his spiritual adviser. The gift comprised the whole of the plaintiff's property, and the only reason for its execution was the plaintiff's desire to secure benefits to his soul in the next world. Almost immediately after the execution of the deed the plaintiff repudiated it, and sued for its cancellation on the ground of fraud. It was held that having regard to the fiduciary relation subsisting between the parties, the burden rested upon the defendant to show that the transaction was made without undue influence and in good faith; and, in the absence of such proof, the plaintiff was entitled to obtain cancellation of the deed.[31]

14. GUARDIAN AND WARD

It has been held that where a son made a gift in favour of his father, the father has to show that he has not abused his position and the gift was not brought about by any undue influence on his part and the donor had independent advice when the gift was made.[32]

The presumption under the section cannot go beyond the relations stated therein. Any other presumption has to be brought under Section 114.

15. WILLS

A Will is not a "transaction between two parties" within the meaning of Section 111, because a Will is a unilateral document. Hence a Will may be treated as an exception to the principle contained under Section 111. However, in the case of a Will also a person who is benefited under the Will may be in a position of active confidence towards the testator in some cases.

The Supreme Court observed "When once it has been proved that a Will has been executed with due solemnities by a person of competent understanding and apparently a free agent, the burden of proving that it was executed under undue influence is on the party who alleges it."[33] It was further held that at times phychological factors and the frame of mind of the testator may determine his action; however, the possibilities of fraud or fabrication, particularly in cases of old and feeble persons cannot be ruled out and the courts have to scrutinize the surrounding circumstances very carefully; there is no presumption of law or fact in this country that a woman to whom a man is engaged to be married is in a position to dominate his Will so as to override his own real intentions; it is not mere influence, but undue influence that has to be proved by the party who sets up the plea. It was a case of a Will in favour of a newly wedded wife and the testator died sometime after the marriage.[34]

The Privy Council held that in order to defeat a Will on the ground of undue influence, it must amount to coercion, fraud, or duress.[35] Section 111 applies to Wills also.[36]

It was held by the Madras High Court "There is a difference between the case of Wills and cases of contracts or gifts or settlement deeds as regards the burden of proof. In the case of Wills, it is for the person who impeaches the Will as having been executed under influence to set up and prove it. But in the case of gifts, or settlements where the donee or the settlor is shown to have been a person in real or apparent authority or in a fiduciary relationship to the donee, or settlor, or where the donor or settlor's mental capacity was temporarily or permanently affected by reason of age, illness or mental or bodily distress, the onus is upon the donee or settlor to prove that the gift or settlement was not brought about by undue influence."[37]

Evey influence is not under influence, and the mere fact that a bequest is in favour of a person who was looking after the testator at or about the time of the Will does not by itself indicate that the will was executed under undue influence; in such cases the burden lies on the testator or persons claiming under him to prove undue influence.[38]

COMMENTS

1. PRINCIPLE AND SCOPE

The section is based on the principle that when a particular relationship, such as marriage, is shown to exist, then its continuance must prima facie be presumed.[40] Under the section the fact that any person was born:—

(a) during the continuance of a valid marriage between his mother and any man, or

(b) within two hundred and eighty days after its dissolution, the mother remaining unmarried, shall be conclusive proof that he is the legitimate son of that man unless the parties had no access to each other at any time when he could have been begotten.

Evidence that a child is born during wedlock is sufficient to establish its legitimacy and shifts the burden of proof to the party, seeking to establish the contrary.

The presumption under this section is a conclusive presumption of law which can be displaced only by proof of non-access between the parties to the marriage at a time when accoding to the ordinary course of nature the husband could have been the father of the child.[41] Access and non-access connote existence and non-existence of opportunities for marital intercourse.

Sections 41, 112 and 113 are the only sections which deal with matters which are to be regarded as 'conclusive proof'. No rule of the kind can be based on considerations of evidence because enquiry is altogether excluded. The basis of the rule in the first case (Section 112) seems to be a notice that it is undesirable to enquire into the paternity of a child whose parents have access to each other. This section refers to the point of time of the birth of the child as the deciding factor and not to the time of conception of that child the latter point of time has to be considered only to see whether the husband has no access to the mother.[42]

It is the principle of law that "Odiosa et inkonesta non sunt in lege prae sumenda" (Nothing odious or dishonourable will be presumed by the law). So the law presumes against vice and immorality. One of the strongest illustrations of the principle, is the presumption in favour of legitimacy of children in a civilized society. But, where illegitimacy seems as common as marriage and legitimacy, a presumption of legitimacy cannot be drawn and legitimacy or illegitimacy will have to be proved like any other fact in issue.[43]

The presumption under Section 112 should be drawn by all courts, Civil, Criminal and revenue governed by the Evidence Act.[44]

The provisions of Section 112 are as much applicable to the offspring of a marriage between Hindus, as it is to children of spouses professing other faiths including Mohammadan.[45]

2. MOHAMMADAN LAW

According to Mohammadan law a child born six months after marriage or within 280 days after divorce or the death of the husband is presumed to be his legitimate offspring. If the question for decision be one of evidence only it will be governed by this section[46] and the child will be considered legitimate if born within six months after marriage of its parents[47]. A child born more than two hundred eighty days after the dissolution of his mother's marriage with her first husband but less than six months after her marriage with her second husband was held entitled to inherit as the legitimate son of the second husband.[48]

Under the Mohammadan law the legitimacy has to be considered with reference to the date of conception.[49]

It was held that even if at the date of their marriage the parties were foreigners and even if the parties had not abandoned their domicile of origin which was in Iran and acquired their domicile in India, it is a clear principle of law that where it is established that there has been a marriage in fact and particularly if the marriage is followed by cohabitation, there would be a presumption that there has been a marriage which is valid in law, though that presumption, of course, is rebuttable.[50]

This section has no application when maternity is in dispute and not paternity.[51]

The presumption under Section 112 only applies in favour of marriage and legitimacy, it is not applicable to any particular form of marriage so as to create a particular status to the child.[52]

Unless it is established beyond doubt that a woman was the exclusively kept mistress of the man and relationship was virtually one of monogamy, it cannot be legitimately presumed that the child was born to the woman through that man.[53]

3. DURING THE CONTINUANCE OF A VALID MARRIAGE BETWEEN HIS MOTHER AND ANY MAN

The presumption as to paternity in this section only arises in connection with the offspring of a married couple. The section applies to the legitimacy of the children of a married person only.[54] On the birth of a child during marriage the presumption of legitimacy is conclusive no matter how soon the birth occurs after the marriage.[55]

Even children born with only a gestation period of six months have been known to survive and live. Where a child was born eight months after date of marriage there could be no doubt that she could very well be the child of the father.[56] There must be marriage between the parties who make acknowledgement of paternity, Mere admission of paternity is not enough proof of legitimacy when the existence of marriage is not shown.[57] When the wife was driven out by the husband within few days after the marriage on the ground of her concealed pregnancy and a child was born within four months after being driven out, it was held that no presumption under Section 112 can be raised.[58]

When proof is given of the marriage on a certain date, the court may under Section 4 consider the marriage as subsisting on a subsequent date also unless and until it is disproved.[59] Under the section the presumption of legitimacy follows the subsistence of a valid marriage.[60]

It is upon the person who claims to be the legitimate issue of his parents to bring forward satisfactory evidence in support of their marriage.[61]

The law presumes in favour of marriage and against concubinage. Continuous coabituation between a man and a woman for a number of years may raise the presumption, though it is rebuttable. Where a marriage took place many years ago though the evidence is unsatisfactory it cannot displace the presumption.[62] Where it was proved that a man and woman have been having cohabitation for a long period, that cohabitation would produce a presumption that they were married spouses. But if the woman with whom there was such cohabitation is proved to be a public woman, that presumption would be unavailable.[63] Although the law presume in favour of marriage and against concubinage it does not presume that concubinage ripens into marriage by mere efflux of time or birth of children.[64]

Children born to a married women cannot be held to be the progeny of the paramour.[65]

A person claiming as an illegitimate son must establish the alleged paternity in the same manner as any other disputed question of relationship.[66] The presumption that children born of a married woman, during the lifetime of her husband are the legitimate offspring of that woman and her husband, is not conclusive proof of their legitimacy and must be regarded as fully rebutted where the woman admittedly lived four years with another person and they both asserted such children to be the offspring of their union.[67]

There must be continuance of valid marriage if presumption is to be made under this section.[68]

Where a wife came to her husband's home a few days before he died and remained there up to the time of his death and it was shown that a child alleged to be that of her husband, was the child of the wife, and that it was born within the time necessary to give rise to the presumption under this section, it was held in the absence of any evidence to show that the husband could not have had connection with his wife during the time she was residing with him the presumption as to the paternity of the child given by this section must prevail. The fact that the husband was, during the period within the child must have been begotten, suffering from a serious illness which terminated fatally shortly afterwards, was held not sufficient to rebut the presumption.[69]

A woman 'shudra' by caste deserted her husband and lived with another man and a child was born from that relationship. The paternity of the child was acknowledged by the relatives. The child would be a legitimate one as the matrimony was acknowledged by the relatives and abandoning by a 'shudra' woman of her husband amounted to divorce.[70]

4. MEDICAL EVIDENCE

It was held by the Supreme Court in Mahendra Manilal Nanavati v. Sushila Mahendra Nanavati[71] that the usual period of gestation from the date of first coitus is between 265 and 270 days and delivery is expected in about 280 days from the first day of menstruation period to a woman conceiving a child; the medical opinion as is disclosed by text books on obstetrics and Gynaecology refer to some rare exceptions of live births even with a gestation period of a few days less than 180 days.

Where the child was born after 171 days of the first coitus between the husband and wife, and the delivery was normal, normally the court should hold that the child was not the child of the husband unless there is evidence which would justify the court in holding otherwise.

When the husband failed to prove that the child who was born 7 months after the marriage was a prematurely born child the presumption is in favour of legitimacy and the child will be entitled to maintenance.[72]

5. WITHIN TWO HUNDRED AND EIGHTY DAYS AFTER ITS DISSOLUTION, THE MOTHER REMAINING UNMARRIED

The section does not lay down a maximum period of gestation, and therefore does not bar the proof of the legitimacy of a child born more than two hundred and eighty days after dissolution of marriage, the effect of the section being merely that no presumption in favour of legitimacy is raised, and the question must be decided simply upon the evidence for and against legitimacy.[73] A person born within two hundred and eighty days after the death of his father is pressumbly his legitimate son.[74] When a person claims under this section, to be the son of a deceased person, he must prove that he was born within two hundred and eighty days after the death of his father.[75]

The maximum period of gestation cannot be more than 360 days (Modi's Medical Jurisprudence and Toxicology, 13th Ed, p. 313.

The Bombay High Court held that the fact in determining the legitimacy of a posthumous child born beyond the period of 280 days the principles enunciated in divorce cases and that cases during lawful wedlock would not in principle make any difference; as the questions of adultery and legitimacy are closely interlocked, one completely dependent upon the other, the quantum of proof must be the same in each case and the evidence must show that the child is not a legitimate child beyond any reasonable doubt. The mere fact that 306 days had lapsed after the death of the father when the child was born, would not be sufficient to hold that the posthumous son was an illegitimate son.[76]

The presumption of legitimacy can be drawn if a child is born beyond the period of 280 days, which is a reasonable period of normal period of gestation.[77]

Where a child was born 8 months after the marriage and the husband pleaded that he was incapaciated for having sexual intercourse for one months from the date of marriage on account of some operation undergone, it was held that even assuming that the husband was so incapaciated the time available over 7 months was sufficient to raise the presumption that he was the father of the child.[78]

It was held that a child born 223 days after the husband's death was legitimate.[79]

Child born after 470 days after husband's death was held illegitimate.[80]

Where a child was born 6 months 4 days after the marriage and it was found it was a normal delivery and it was not a case of premature birth of the child, it was held that the presumption is rebutted.[81]

Though ordinarily the period of gestation is 10 days + 9 months after the date of last menstruation, the child may be born earlier than 280 days on account of existence of certain individual factors. A child born on the 240th day after sexual intercourse is not unnatural, and so the child is legitimate.[82]

Where a muslim woman delivered a child 220 days after the marriage it was held that as the period is sufficient for conception and birth of a child, it would be legitimate.[83]

Where a woman left the husband 10 days after the marriage and was living as a concubine of the appellant and a child was born 7 months after the woman leaving her husband and when there was no evidence that the birth of the child was premature or that the woman was living as a concubine of the appellant even before her marriage it was held that the appallent cannot be presumed to be the father of the child.[84]

6. UNLESS IT CAN BE SHOWN THAT THE PARTIES TO THE MARRIAGE HAD NO ACCESS TO EACH OTHER

Under the section the child born in wedlock should be treated as the child of the person who was at the time of its birth, the husband of the mother, unless it is shown that he had no access to the mother at the time of its conception quite irrespective of the question whether the mother was a married woman or not at the time of the conception.[85] Where the wife was pregnant on the date of marriage and the husband had no access to the wife before marriage, there was no question of calling in aid the presumption under Section 112.[86]

By 'having no access' is meant having no opportunity of sexual intercourse, and in order to displace the conclusive presumption it must be shown that no such opportunity occurred down to a point of time so near to the birth as to render paternity impossible. To rebut the legal presumption under this section, it is for those, who dispute the paternity of the child, to prove non-access of the husband to his wife during the period when with respect to the date of its birth, it must, in the ordinary course of nature, have been begotten.[87] Mere fact that the husband and wife were residing separately in close proximity of distance, is not sufficient to prove non-access.[88]

The Supreme Court observed "The presumption, which Section 112 contemplates, is a conclusive presumption of law which can be displaced only by proof that the particular fact mentioned in the section namely non-access between the parties to the marriage at a time when according to the ordinary course of nature the husband could have been the father of the child."[89] Access and non-access connote existence and non-existence of opportunity for marital intercourse. Non-access can be established not merely by positive or direct evidence, it can be proved undoubtedly like any other physical fact by evidence, either direct or circumstantial, which is relevant to the issue, though as presumption of legitimacy is highly favoured by law it is necessary that proof of non-access must be clear and satisfactory.[1] The non-access would include incapability of access on account of impotency, want of virility because of immature age or other physical incompetency.[2]

The presumption can be rebutted only if the marriage of the parents is shown to be invalid or the parties to the marriage had no access to each other at any time when the child could be begotten.[3] The presumption would stand rebutted if it is shown that the husband had severed all physical relations with the wife.[4]

The standard of proof of non-access is similar to that in a criminal case.

It is upon the person who claims to be the legitimate issue of his parents to bring forward satisfactory evidence in support of their marriage.[5]

Even where the husband and wife were living apart in the same village long before the birth of the child, unless the husband is able to establish absence of access, presumption raised under the section will not be displaced.[6]

The principle of this section does not apply to the case of a paramour and the presumption can be rebutted when the mother of the child is not a wife but a mistress and it may be open for the mistress to prove that the real father of the child born during the period of her concubinage is different from her paramour.[7]

Where a wife came to her husband's house a few days before he died and remainded there up to the time of his death and it was shown that a child alleged to be that of her husband was the child of the wife and that it was born within the time necessary to give rise to the presumption under this section, it was held, in the absence of any evidence to show that the husband could not have had connection with his wife during the time she was residing with him, the presumption as to the paternity of the child given by this section must prevail. The fact that the husband was during the period within which the child must have been begotten was suffering from a serious illness which terminated fatally shortly afterwards was held, under the circumstances, not sufficient to rebut the presumption.[8]

A child was born after marriage but before gauna or bidai (departure to husband's place). It was held that there was no presumption of legitimacy unless proof of access was offered.[9]

Merely because the husband was suffering from a serious illness, it is not a sufficient reason for holding that the presumption which arises under Section 112 cannot be attracted.[10] Access means effective access and therefore physical incapacity to procreate is non-access. Where non-access on account of immature age is alleged it would be necessary to prove first the precise age of the husband on the date of conception and secondly to negative the possibility of premature virility at that age owing to precocious development. Without such proof non-access based on the alleged incapacity of the husband cannot be made out.[11] To repudiate the presumption it must be proved that the access was impossible on account of impotency, serious illness or it must be shown by very convincing evidence that though opportunity existed there was no sexual intercourse during the period the child could have been begotten.[12] The husband has to prove that it was physically impossible for him to have cohabited with his wife during the time in which the child was conceived.[13]

A youth of 15 years was held not-incapable of procreation.[14]

In a case the parties married in 1969, the husband underwent vasectomy operation on 8-1-76, both were living together and the wife gave birth to a child on 30-8-1978, it was held that the husband had not proved that in or about November 1977, when the child was conceived, he was unable to procreate. So the child should be presumed to be legitimate.[15] When there is no satisfactory evidence that even during the period the wife was living with another person, her husband had nothing to do with her, it was held that children born must be presumed to be the children of the husband.[16] Where a child was born on 13-5-1949 and divorce was obtained on 30-5-1949, and the father filed petition for divorce on the ground of the wife's immoral life, it was held that in the absence of satisfactory evidence of non-access between the parents during the pendency of the divorce petition this section is applicable and the finding about the legitimacy of the child was correct.[17] The presumption of legitimacy under Section 112 will not be displaced by the mere fact that the husband and wife were living apart in the same village long before the birth of the child, unless the husband is able to establish the absence of access, when the child could have been begotten.[18] Where the wife was living with her parents during 1½ years before the birth of the child and the parents house was only two miles away from the husband's village it was held that it is reasonable to assume that the husband had opportunity of intercourse, and so the presumption remained unrebutted.[19]

Where it is shown that during the time the child could have been begotten the husband was out of India no presumption of legitimacy can arise and an admission by the wife in her husband's divorce petition that, the child was born to her husband can be of no avail.[20] Where the wife left for England on 11-6-53 and she gave birth in England to a male child on 12-5-54 and during that period the husband never left the shores of India it was held that it was impossible for the husband to have access to her and so the husband was not the father of the child.[21] Where the child was born two years after the husband and wife separated and it was proved they had no access after separation, it was held that the presumption stood rebutted.[22] Child born 334 days after the parents were proved to have had no matrimonial intercourse was held illegitimate as there was no access by the husband, during the period which the child could have been begotten.[23] Desertion for a period of two years resulted in a divorce; the wife gave birth to a child during that period; the husband pleaded 'no access' as she had gone to a village remote from Delhi, and he went there only once with a barat (Marriage party) and was beaten up by in laws. Held, he had discharged the burden of proving non-access and, therefore there was no presumption of legitimacy.[24]

Presumption of legitimacy is available when the evidence is conflicting between the husband and the wife as to their common residence and accessibility to wife is not completely ruled out.[25] Even if it is proved that the mother committed adultery with a number of men it will not of itself suffice to prove the illegitimacy of the child if she had access to her husband during the time the child could have been begotten.[26] In the absence of proof of non-access, even though wife was living apart and leading an unchaste life the child would be deemed to be legitimate.[27] If the husband has had access, adultery on the wife's part will not justify a finding that another man was the father[28] but where there was evidence that the mother of the child had illicit intimacy with a certain person, to prove illegitimacy of the child, it should be established that such a person had opportunity of access to her at the time of conception as in the instant case she was working in the house of that certain person, moving closely with the inmates and helping him in hotel business which was held to be sufficient to show, he having opportunity of access to her.[29]

Where there may be an opportunity to have access still the husband can prove that there was no actual cohabitation.[30] Where wife and husband are living in the same room it should be presumed that the pregnancy was due to cohabitation with the husband.[31] Where the consumation of marriage and access between the husband and wife were admitted and the medical opinion supported the wife, legitimacy of child would be presumed.[32] Where there was a family custom that husband and wife will have no coitus unless particular ceremony is performed and when it was not performed, but the husband and wife were living under the same roof four months together, it was held that non-performance of ceremony was not proof of non-access. The onus lies heavily on the person alleging illegitimacy and non-access may be proved by legal evidence admissible to prove any other physical act.[33]

A woman married a man in September, 1903; the marriage was dissolved in May 1904; she married another in June, 1904 a son was born to her in September, 1904 during the continuance of her marriage with her second husband. It appeared that the latter had access to her during her first marriage. In a suit by the son to recover the property of the second husband on his death, it was contended that the plaintiff was not the legitimate son of the second husband. It was held that the plaintiff was in law the legitimate son of the second husband of the woman, and was entitled to his properties.[34] The question for decision was the paternity of the defendant, who was born of one H on October, 17, 1919; i.e., two hundred and seventy nine days after January 10, 1919, the date of the death of her first husband. She had entered into a second marriage on February, 25th, 1919 with another and defendant was born during the continuance of that marriage. It was held that as this section referred to the point of time of the birth of the child as the deciding factor and not the time of conception of that child, the presumption was that the second husband was the father of the defendant.[35] Where a married woman married a second time claiming that her first marriage has been dissolved and begot a child while she was living with her second husband and when it was found that her first marriage was not legally dissolved and it was subsisting in the eye of law and where there is evidence to show that her first husband had no access to her at the time when the child was begotten by her, it was held that the child was the progeny of the person with whom she was living (Second husband).[36]

7. EVIDENCE OF HUSBAND AND WIFE

Reading S. 120 with this section it is clear that there is no prohibition of the parents of a child from deposing whether or not they had at any time, when the child would have been begotten, access to one another.[37]

The principle of English Common Law according to which neither a husband nor a wife is permitted to give evidence of non-access, after marriage to bastardise a child born in lawful wedlock, does not apply to legitimacy proceedings in India.[38]

According to the Bombay High Court a wife can be examined to prove non-access of her husband during her married life, without independent evidence being first offered to prove the illegitimacy of the children[39]. The Bombay High Court has also held that the rule of English law laid down in Russell v. Russell[40] that the declaration of a father or mother cannot be admitted to bastardise the issue born after the marriage is not applicable in India[41]. The Madras High Court has held that the wife is a competent witness to prove access or non-access by her husband[42]. The Allahabad High Court has held that the English rule that such evidence is inadmissible because it is evidence which tends to bastardise the child is not applicable to the Courts in India; there is nothing in the Indian Evidence Act which renders this evidence inadmissible. In a suit for divorce by the husband on the ground of the wife's adultery, alleged to be established by the fact of her having given birth to an illegitimate child, evidence by the husband of non-access to the wife at any time when the child could have been begotten is admissible; and an admission by the wife that the child is illegitimate is also admissible in evidence[43]. The Calcutta High Court has similarly held that there is nothing in this section to show that the husband or wife is precluded from giving evidence in order to show thatt they had no access to each other at any time when the child could have been begotten.[44]

The rule laid down in Russell v. Russell[45] has now been abrogated by the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1949 (12, 13 & 14 Geo VI, c. 100), S. 7, which says that notwithstanding any rule of law the evidence of a husband or wife shall be admissible in any proceedings to prove that marital intercourse did not take place between them during any period.

8. PROOF

It was held that an extract of the birth register containing the name of the mother and the information given by her about the father would not be binding on the presumed father.[46] An entry in the birth register containing the name of the mother only, does not warrant the inference that the child was not legitimate.[47]

9. MAINTENANCE

The mother can claim maintenance for her child from her paramour if he could prove that she was exclusively under his control and that her husband had no access to her even if the marriage was subsisting.[48]

Despite the subsistence of marriage, child could be proved to have been born to a paramour. Otherwise the husband would be compelled to maintain the child as legitimacy has to be presumed.[49] It is not quite impossible for children born to a married woman to be legally held to be the progeny of the paramour. If that is proved the paramour has to pay the maintenance to the child.[50]

Where the wife and husband were living together for 5 years and the husband drove her out doubting her chastity on the basis of anonymous letters, the wife and children were held entitled to maintenance and the presumption regarding the children's legitimacy arises under Section 112.[51] In a case a daughter, born during the pendency of petition for maintenance by the wife, claimed maintenance from her father but he denied paternity. Evidence showed that the wife was pregnant when she left the husband's house and the husband failed to prove her having any illicit relation with anyone. He had admitted her paternity in an earlier petition. Besides, there was other evidence supporting her claim. It was held that she was entitled to maintenance.[52]

10. BLOOD TESTS; DNA FINGER PRINTING

It is now usual whenever a question of paternity of a child arises, to direct the use of blood tests. Such evidence is of great value in issues concerning the paternity of a child. Blood groups according to scientist have a causative relation between the trait of the progenitor and that of the progeny. In other words the blood composition of a child may be of some evidence as to the childs' paternity. A detailed study of the scientific process is given in WIGMORE'S EVIDENCE (III Edition) at page 168. In B. v. Attorney General[53], ORMROD J. referred to the blood groups in the blood analysis and found that the blood group of the person alleged to be the father and of the child were entirely inconsistent and that it was for the expert who did the tests to say positively that the child was not the son of the alleged father. COMROD J. observed that such a test saves the court from having to rely on the presumption regarding paternity. In F v. F[54] in a divorce proceeding by the husband on the ground of the wife's adultery the question of paternity of a child was in issue. On the medical evidence based on the test of blood samples, it was held that the child was not the child of the husband and hence the wife had committed adultery.

In, In re : Le[55] it was held that the court had power to order an infant to be subjected to a blood group test notwithstanding that the guardian ad litem did not consent. In S v. S[56] the House of Lords held that the refusal of the guardian to have the child's blood tested was improper for it was in the interests of the child and also of justice that the court should have before it the best evidence available including modern scientific evidence provided by blood which might resolve the issue conclusively.

At present in England the aspect of evidence is controlled by the Family Law Reforms Act, 1969 which provides for obtaining of blood test evidence in any case where paternity is in issue.

The blood group tests are useful only to exclude the possibility that a man is the father. Sophisticated blood tests are now being adopted which are so advanced as capable of providing a very high or low probability of paternity. Tests made of the DNA (Deoxy Ribo Nucleic Acid in blood or other bodily substances or tissues) can provide what can practically be regarded as certainity in paternity cases. The technique is known as 'finger printing'. The essential difference between conventional blood tests and DNA 'finger printing' lies in the extremely polarised possibilities. If a man is not the father of the child, the odds of failing to get an exclusion in such a case are roughly 30,000 millions to one. If the man matifies the child in blood group, even then odds that he is not the father are of a similar magnitude. The probabilities are of such an astronismical scale that they reduce the results to absolute certainity. The process however is said to be very labour intensive and needs meticulous expertise and much experience and it also takes several days to complete (See - DNA Finger Printing and the Law by ROBIN M WHITE and JEREMY J.D. Greenwod - 51 (1988) Modern Law Review P. 145.

11. BLOOD GROUP TESTS AND DNA FINGER PRINTING CANNOT BE USED

It is however doubtful whether blood group tests or DNA 'finger printing' can be made use of in cases governed by Section 112. Section 112 provides "the fact that any person was born during the continuance of a valid marriage between his mother and any man during the substance of the marriage or within 280 days after its dissolution, the mother remaining unmarried, shall be conclusive proof that he is the legitimate son of that man unless it can be shown that the parties to the marriage had no access to each other when he could have been begotten" but where consumation of marriage and access between the husband and wife were admitted, no adverse inference could drawn against the wife for refusing to submit to DNA Test though due to her personal problem.[57]

Considering the imperfection of science on this subject, a Division Bench of Calcutta High Court refused to allow blood test to determine paternity.[58] Thus the only way the conclusive proof can be rebutted is by proving non-access. No other method of rebuttal is permissible under the Act. It was observed: "The conclusive presumption of law under Section 112 can be displaced on strong, distinct satisfactory, and conclusive evidence of non-access between the parties at the time when the child would have been begotten. The court cannot base a conclusion on evidence different from that required by law or decide on balance of probabilities which will be the result if blood test evidence is accepted. Further blood test is a constraint on personal liberty of a person and therefore cannot be carried out without his consent, though there is no illegality in refusing a blood test and at the most, adverse inference can be drawn in case of refusal. It therefore, follows that blood tests or DNA 'finger printing' test may not be admissible in cases under Section 112 as one more method of rebutting the conclusive proof cannot be introduced into Section 112.[59]

In view of the provision of Section 112, there is no scope of permitting the husband to avail of the blood test for dislodging the presumption of legitimacy and paternity arising out of this section.[60] Blood group test to determine the paternity of a child born during wedlock is not permissible.[61]

It is therefore, suggested that a proviso on the following lines may be added to Section 112.

"Provided that this will not preclude evidence of blood samples or bodily specimens to be taken to show that a person is or is not excluded from being the father of another person".

It is also necessary to confer powers on the courts to have such tests conducted. It is to be noted that Art 20(3) of the Constitution does not come into play except in criminal cases.

The Supreme Court laid down the following as to the permissibility of the blood test to prove the child's paternity :

(1) That the Courts in India cannot order blood test as a matter of course.

(2) Wherever applications are made for such prayers in order to have roving inquiry, the prayer for blood test cannot be entertained.

(3) There must be a strong prima facie case in that the husband must establish non-access in order to dispel the presumption arising under Section 112.

(4) The Court must carefully examine as to what would be the consequence of ordering the blood test; whether it will have the effect of branding a child as a bastard and the mother as an unchaste woman.

(5) No one can be compelled to give sample of blood for analysis.[62]

The son also cannot be forced to undergo medical test to prove his paternity if he was born during lawful wedlock of his father and mother, more so when his mother was not alive.[63] that a valid cession of such territory took place at the date mentioned in such notification.

COMMENTS

This section was enacted to exclude inquiry by Courts of Justice into the validity of the acts of the Government so far as cession of territory to any Indian State was concerned. But the section is a dead-letter because it was declared to be ultra vires by the Privy Council in a case in which it was decided that the Governor-General-in-Council being precluded by 24 & 25 Vic. c. 67, S. 22, from legislating directly as to sovereignty or dominion of the Crown over any part of its territories in India, or as to the allegiance of British subject, could not, by any legislative Act, purporting to make a notification in the Government Gazette conclusive evidence of a cession of territory, exclude inquiry as to the nature and lawfulness of that cession[64]. The section now is obsolete.[65]

Presumption as to abetment of suicide by a married woman.

S. 113-A. When the question is whether the commission of suicide by a woman had been abetted by her husband or any relative of her husband and it is shown that she had committed suicide within a period of seven years from the date of her marriage and that her husband or such relative of her husband had subjected her to cruelty, the Court may presume, having regard to all the other circumstances of the case, that such suicide had been abetted by her husband or by such relative of her husband.

Explanation.*—For the purposes of this section, 'cruelty' shall have the same meaning as in Section 498A of the Indian Penal Code (45 of 1860).

COMMENTS

This section was inserted by the Criminal Law (2nd Amendment Act 46 of 83) with effect from 26-12-1983. This section states that when a married woman, if shown to have committed suicide within a period of seven years from the date of her marriage and her husband or relative of her husband had subjected her to cruelty, then the presumption arises that such suicide had been abetted by her husband or by such relative of her husband. It does not apply to other cases of abetment to commit suicide.[66] The explanation makes it clear that the expression cruelty shall have the same meaning as given in Section 498-A of the Indian Penal Code.

The Supreme Court observed: "The greed for dowry, and indeed the dowry system as an institution, calls for the severest condemnation. It is evident that legislative measures such as the Dowry Prohibition Act have not met with the success for which they were designed.

Repeated instances are being highlighted in various newspapers in the country. There are also social organizations focussing the attention of public on this issue. To ventilate the grievances about atrocities on newly married brides due to dowry or other such similar demands from their husbands or in-laws, women social workers had taken up the cause in a movement in the country and due to the effective persuasion by such social compulsions, S. 498-A, I.P.C. and S. 113-A, Evidence Act, have been introduced on 25th Dec., 1983. The aforesaid provisions are obviously intended to cure the existing evil in the society. The evil at many times resulted in atrocities on married women and various acts of cruelty were being practised. No doubt, there were some provisions available in the Penal Code such as S. 306, I.P.C., but the instances were such which could not come to light due to their occurrence in the house of their in-laws. Naturally, the victims could not take recourse to public authorities to ventilate their grievances. After all, the social conditions, family traditions, etc., prevented the brides to take any recourse to public authorities. They could not even convey the atrocities to their parents. It is therefore to curb this social evil which resulted in atrocities on women that the aforesaid provisions are introduced."[67]

This section applies even if the suicide took place prior to the insertion of this section[68] as this section is procedural in nature, it is retrospective in operation.[69] In the case of offence of abetment of suicide by a married women, past events of cruelty taking place prior to the amendment can be considered; it does not amount to giving retrospective operation to the amended provision u/s. 113-A.[70]

Where the wife died within three months of marriage and the dead body was removed to another place and cremated without intimation to her parents and there was presence of poison on the mattress on which she was taken to another place, it was held that bail should be refused to the husband and others who were suspected at the stage anterior to the filing of the challan.[71]

If it is not established that the deceased had been subjected to cruelty Section 113-A is not applicable.[72] In a case of harassment of wife for outstanding items of dowry, the demand was met and the matter was settled, one and a half months after which she committed suicide but there was no evidence of further demand or torture. It was held that the probability of existence of nexus between cruelty and suicide suffered a set back and it was unsafe and unjust to raise the presumption under this section.[73] A domestic quarrel took place between the deceased and her sister-in-laws over some milk and thereafter, they abused and dragged her to the courtyard. This was held to be not amounting to cruelty within the meaning of S. 498A, I.P.C. and the presumption under this section could not be raised.[74] The deceased did not complain about harassment and cruelty to her mother who was nearest to her and the accused put forth the explanation that the deceased was short tempered and was not happy due to his poor financial condition which was held to be plausible though not proved and was accepted.[75]

It must be proved that the wife was subjected to cruelty as defined u/s. 498-A, Indian Penal Code. Where the husband came late in the night after taking liquor daily inspite of the protests from the wife, it was held that that fact alone cannot be taken as cruelty, and that the essential ingredients of cruelty are not fulfilled in the case for raising the presumption.[76] But, drinking and coming late coupled with the fact of beating and demanding dowry amounts to cruelty and a presumption can be drawn under Section 113-A.[77] Where the death of the deceased was due to burns and she gave a dying declaration suggesting that her husband and mother-in-law consistently harassed, tortured and beat her for bringing inadequate dowry and it was corroborated by other relations of the deceased and when the death took place within seven years of the marriage, it was held a presumption under Section 113-A arises as to abetment.[78]

The requirement of proof beyond reasonable doubt is not altered by the introduction of Section 498-A, I.P.C. or Section 113-A of this Act.[79]

Presumption under this section is not mandatory.[80]

1. "HAVING REGARD TO ALL THE OTHER CIRCUMSTANCES OF THE CASE"

These words in this section give wide powers to the Court to appraise evidence and come to conclusion whether there was some extraneous cause for a woman to commit suicide. These in-built safeguards do not violate the right to life and fair procedure provided under Arts. 20(3) and 21 of the Constitution.[81] The 'all the other circumstances of the case' requires that cause and effect relationship between cruelty and suicide has to be established before drawing the presumption.[82]

2. APPLICABILITY OF S. 113-A TO HUSBAND

The provisions of the presumption under Section 113-A are not applicable against the wife due to whose cruelty the husband commits suicide. In the instant case the husband committed suicide due to her alleged characterless manner.[83]

Presumption as to dowry death.

S. 113-B. When the question is whether a person has committed the dowry death of a woman and it is shown that soon before her death such woman had been subjected by such person to cruelty or harassment for, or in connection with, any demand for dowry, the Court shall presume that such person had caused the dowry death.

Explanation.*—For the purpose of this section, "dowry death" shall have the same meaning as in S. 304B of Indian Penal Code (45 of 1860).

COMMENTS

This section was inserted by the Dowry Prohibition (Amendment Act 43 of 1986). This section provides that when a married woman had been subjected to cruelty or harassment for or in connection with any demand for dowry before her death, the court shall presume that such person had caused the dowry death. The Explanation says, that the expression 'Dowry Death' shall have the same meaning as it has in Section 304-B of the Indian Penal Code.

The applicability of this section is limited to cases 'when the question is whether a person has committed dowry death of a woman' and that too requires the proof of two further facts : firstly, it should be shown that soon before her death such a woman was subjected by such person to 'cruelty' or 'harassment' and secondly, that the cruelty by such person was 'for or in connection with any demand for dowry'.[84] These provisions are not violative of Arts. 14, 20(3) and 21 of the Constitution.[85]

Where the death of the married woman occurred on account of asphyxia due to hanging within three years of her marriage, and is otherwise than under normal circumstances, it would still be a death coming within the scope of 304-B, when cruelty or harassment by her husband or any relative of her husband in connection with any demand for dowry, is proved.[86]

In a case of death of a newly wedded girl of burn injuries, the father of the deceased stated in the F.I.R. itself that the deceased committed suicide because of harrasment and torture by her in-laws for bringing insufficient dowry and that the deceased gave her information to him, it was held that the deceased died commiting suicide at the instigation of her husband and in-laws and the presumption under Section 113-A is also available. It was also held that the provision Section 113-A is proceedural and therefore has retrospective application.[87]

In the case of dowry death, it was held that the actual participation of husband or his relative in the commission of the offence is not required to be proved.[88]

Where in a case of unnatural death of the wife, the evidence showed that there was dowry demand and cruelty on the part of the husband, presumption under this section was available.[89] The wife was sent back to her parent's home due to dispute regarding dowry and was brought back after the 'panchayat' resolved the dispute. Her death occurred 10-15 days after the 'panchayat' during the period of which there was no evidence of cruelty or harassment with demand of dowry. Presumption of dowry death could not be raised.[90] The accused husband demanded some amount from the father of the deceased wife six months after the marriage which was paid to him. He again demanded money after about two years from the first demand and the wife died after two years from the second demand. It was held that presumption under Section 113-B could not be raised.[91] Where in a case of dowry death the prosecution witness, the husband, stated that her death was due to diarrhoea and he was neither declared hostile nor cross-examined on that issue, the presumption under Section 113-B could not be raised.[92]

1. "SOON BEFORE"

"Soon before" is very relevant and it has to be shown that soon before the occurrence there was cruelty or harassment and only in that case presumption operates. It is a relative term and it would depend upon circumstances of each case and no strait jacket formula can be laid down as to what would constitute a period soon before the occurrence. It would normally imply that the interval should not be much between the concerned cruelty or harassment and the death in question.[93] In relation to dowry deaths, the circumstances showing the existence of cruelty or harassment to the deceased are not restricted to a particular instance but normally refer to a course of conduct which may be spread over a period of time. If the cruelty or harassment or demand for dowry in shown to have persisted, it shall be deemed to be "soon before death," if any other intervening circumstance showing the non-existence of such treatment is not on record, before the alleged such treatment and the date of death. It does not mean that such time can be stretched to any period. Proximate and live link between the effect of cruelty based on dowry demand and the consequential death is required to be proved by the prosecution. The demand of dowry, cruelty or harassment based upon such demand and the date of death should not be too remote in time which under the circumstances, be treated as having become stale enough. In the instant case the deceased was subjected to continuous harassment with demand of dowry which continued till she met her parents, two days after which she died. The existence of harassment would be deemed to be "soon before death".[94] In absence of material to infer that the deceased was subjected to cruelty soon before her death and there being a positive evidence on record that the probable cause of the suicide of the deceased was quarrel with some persons, legal presumption under this section could not be drawn against the accused.[95]

Court may presume existence of certain facts.

S. 114. The Court may presume the existence of any fact which it thinks likely to have happened, regard being had to the common course of natural events, human conduct and public and private business, in their relation to the facts of the particular case.

The Court may presume—

(a) that a man who is in possession of stolen goods soon after the theft is either the thief or has received the goods knowing them to be stolen, unless he can account for his possession;

(b) that an accomplice is unworthy of credit, unless he is corroborated in material particulars;

(c) that a bill of exchange, accepted or endorsed, was accepted or endorsed for good consideration;

(d) that a thing or state of things which has been shown to be in existence within a period shorter than that within which such things or states of things usually cease to exist, is still in existence;

(e) that judicial and official acts have been regularly performed;

(f) that the common course of business has been followed in particular cases;

(g) that evidence which could be and is not produced would, if produced, be unfavourable to the person who withholds it;

(h) that if a man refuses to answer a question: which he is not compelled to answer by law, the answer, if given, would be unfavourable to him;

(i) that when a document creating an obligation is in the hands of the obligor, the obligation has been discharged.

But the Court shall also have regard to such facts as the following, in considering whether such maxims do or do not apply to the particular case before it:—

as to illustration (a)—a shop-keeper has in his till a marked rupee soon after it was stolen, and cannot account for its possession specifically, but is continually receiving rupees in the course of his business :

as to illustration (b)—A, a person of the highest character, is tried for causing a man's death by an act of negligence in arranging certain machinery. B, a person of equally good character, who also took part in the arrangement, describes precisely what was done, and admits and explains the common carelessness of A and himself:

as to illustration (b)—a crime is committed by several persons. A, B and C, three of the criminals, are captured on the spot and kept apart from each other. Each gives an account of the crime implicating D, and the accounts corroborate each other in such a manner as to render previous concert highly improbable;

as to illustration (c)—A, the drawer of a bill of exchange, was a man of business. B, the acceptor, was young and ignorant person, completely under A's influence; as to illustration (d)—it is proved that a river ran in a certain course five years ago, but it is known that there have been floods since that time which might change its course; as to illustration (e)—a judicial act, the regularity of which is in question, was performed under exceptional circumstances;

COMMENTS

1. PRINCIPLE AND OBJECT

Sections 104 to 113 direct on whom burden of proof will lie. The court is bound in every instance to presume against that party on whom the burden of proof is directed to lie. No option is given to the court as to whether it will presume the fact or not. But there are various presumptions where room is left for the court to exercise its powers of inference; the court can throw the burden of proof on whichever side it chooses. This sections deals with cases of that description. It declares that the court may, in all cases whatever, draw from the facts before it, whatever inferences it thinks just. The terms of the section are such as to reduce to their proper position of mere maxims, which are to be applied to facts by the courts in their discretion, a large number of presumptions to which English law gives, to a greater or less extent, an artificial value. Nine of the most important of them are given by way of illustrations.[1] No doubt the illustration is only an example or at the utmost it is a guideline. Nonetheless, it has a logical basis. Section 114 helps the Court in deciding on whom is the burden of proof in certain situations. A presumption on facts is to be raised to assist the Court for determining as to the burden of proof in a set of circumstances. As the Court can draw certain inferences either on the basis of cumulative conclusion of circumstances or on a single circumstance, it would be in a position to fix up the responsibility on one or the other party in the case with the burden to reverse such inferred presumptions.[2] Under this section the Court can draw only inferences. It does not authorise the Court to legislate as to the manner in which human beings should conduct themselves in a given set of circumstances.[3]

The effect of this provision is to make it perfectly clear that Courts of Justice are to use their own common sense and experience in judging the effect of particular facts, and that they are to be subjected to no particular rules whatever on the subject. The illustrations given are, for the most part, cases of what in English law are called presumptions of law: artificial rules as to the effect of evidence by which the court is bound to guide its decision, subject, however, to certain limitations which it is difficult either to understand or to apply, but which will be swept away by the Section 114 in question.[4]

A presumption is not evidence or proof. It only shows on whom the burden of proof lies.[5] In effect, presumptions of law or fact may shift the burden of proof, and they may be rebutted not only by evidence but also by presumption of law or fact.[6]

A man is presumed to know and intend the natural consequences of his acts.[7]

Where the special Act prescribes a rule of evidence contrary to this section, and the burden of proof is placed by a particular statute, Section 114 recedes and has no application in such a case and it is not ultra vires.[8]

Where the facts are once ascertained, presumptions arising from conduct cannot establish a right which the facts themselves disprove.[9]

Section 114 is a permissive and not a mandatory section. Court may refuse to raise a presumption in a particular case although such a presumption might have been properly raised in other cases.[10] This section authorises the court to make certain presumptions of fact. They are all presumptions which may naturally arise; but the Lagislature, by the use of the word 'may' instead of 'shall' both in the body of the section and in the illustrations, shows that the court is not compelled to raise them but is to consider whether in all the circumstances of the particular case they should be raised.[11]

Persons, not entitled to take delivery of goods mentioned in Railway luggage ticket, took delivery of goods. The railway clerk was under a misconception that those persons were entitled to take the goods and handed over the goods. Persons found in possession of such goods soon after delivery can be presumed to be in possession of stolen goods.[12]

The section does not lay down hard and fast rule with regard to the circumstances in which any fact or facts may be presumed to exist nor does it contain an exhaustive list of such facts, though it gives a few illustrations from various walks of life.[13]

Wherever the informative facts proved overbalance the probability that the inference would be a sound and just one, the court will exercise its sound discretion in electing not to rest upon the presumption.[14] Section 114 is a general section dealing with presumptions of facts which are inferences of certain fact patterns drawn from the experience and observation of the common course of nature, the constitution of the human mind, the springs of human action, the usages and habits of society and ordinary course of human affairs.[15] A presumption can be drawn only from the facts and not from other presumptions by a process of probable and logical reasoning.[16] In reaching the conclusion the Court can use the process of inferences to be drawn from facts produced or proved. Such inferences are akin to presumptions in law. Law gives absolute discretion to the Court to presume the existence of any fact which it thinks likely to have happened.[17] For the purpose of reaching one conclusion, the Court can rely on a factual presumption. Unless the presumption is disproved or dispelled or rebutted, the Court can treat the presumption as tantamounting to proof. However, it is unsafe to use that presumption to draw yet another discretionary presumption unless there is statutory compulsion.[18]

Presumptions may be either of law or fact, and when of law may be either conclusive (presumptions juris et de jure) or rebuttable (presumptions juris), but when of fact (presumptiones hominis) are always rebuttable. Mixed presumptions are those which are partly of law and partly of fact.[19]

The section provides that the Court may presume the existence of any fact which it thinks likely to have happened, regard being had to the common course of natural events, human conduct and public and private business, in their relation to the facts of the particular case.[20]

The chief function of rebuttable presumptions of law is to determine on whom the burden of proof rests.[21]

Section 114 enables the court to presume the existence of probable facts, regard being had to the human conduct and common course of events as to the common sense being used as a judicial tool.[22] Rules of presumption are deduced from enlightened human knowledge and experience and are drawn from the connection, relation, and confidence of facts and circumstances.[23]

Section 114 authorises the court to draw presumption. If it is refuse to presume a fact under this section, it is not open to the party to question the failure on the part of the court to raise the presumption. This is only a permissive provision enabling, the judge to support his judgement but, by no means, it envisages a mandatory duty.[24] The words 'may presume' in Section 114 clearly indicate that courts cannot be compelled to draw presumptions. It is left to the court to make and not to make presumptions according to the circumstances of the case. Whether a presumption should be raised or not depends upon the facts and circumstances of each case. It is not an error of law if the court does not draw the presumption, Section 114 is a permissive but not a mandatory section.[25]

It was held by the Privy Council that there can be no presumption in favour of a fact which offends a legal principle. For example, that a tenancy by a shebait is a permanent tenancy as it would be a breach of a duty of a shebait.[26]

This Section 114 permits the court to raise a presumption with regard to oral evidence as well as documentary evidence.[27]

If a presumption is not available under one section, nothing prevents the court from drawing the presumption under another section.[28]

There is no scope for presumption when facts are known.[29]

The illustrations given under this section are not exhaustive. They are merely a few examples of this class of "natural" presumptions, and they do not exclude the other numerous cases in which such presumptions are constantly drawn. No hard and fast rule can be laid down as to what inference can be drawn; it all depends upon the facts and circumstances of each case.[30] Illustrations appended to Section 114 are only intended as guide to working and applications of section. They do not restrict presumptions regarding existence of facts covered by illustrations.[31] The illustrations appearing under Section 114 are not intended to lay down rules of law which are exhaustive of the presumptions that may be made under that section itself. They are only examples of circumstances in which certain presumptions may be raised. Whether or not a presumption under Section 114 can be drawn in a particular case depends on the facts and circumstances of the case.[32] The section has given as many as nine illustrations (a to i), but they are not exhaustive. They serve as examples and guide to the court as to whether presumptions can be raised on the facts proved in particular cases. It is to be noted that all such presumptions under this section are rebuttable. The section does not impose on the court strict adherence to any rule/rules in drawing presumptions. The illustrations are merely examples of circumstances in which certain presumptions may be good and other presumptions, of a similar kind in similar circumstances, may be made under the provisions of the section itself. Every one of the illustrations is followed by an exception.[33]

However, in doing so (raising presumptions), the court is to bear in mind the common course of natural events, human conduct and practices prevalent in private and public dealings as well as the facts and circumstances of the case in hand.

Where the court disbelieves the case of the plaintiff and that of the defendant it cannot decree the suit on the basis of presumption only.[34]

There are several presumptions recognised in Hindu law, Mohammadan law, criminal law, etc., e.g., the original status of a Hindu family must be presumed to be joint and undivided; in a Joint Hindu family the whole property of the family is joint estate; in the absence of express contract a Mohammadan dower is presumed to be prompt; every person is presumed to be acquainted with the law of the land; the accused is presumed to be innocent.

2. SOME EXAMPLES OF STATUTORY PRESUMPTIONS

See Sections 118, 119-122, 137 of the Negotiable Instruments Act; Sections 53 and 101 of the Transfer of Property Act; Section 6 of the Land Acquisition Act (I of 1894). There are various other statutory presumptions.

3. COMMON COURSE OF NATURAL EVENTS

Under this section the court may presume the existence of any fact which it thinks likely to have happened regard being had to the common course of natural events, human conduct and public and private business in their relation to the facts of the case. In a case under Prevention of Corruption Act where the accused took out the currency notes and flung them across the wall, the Supreme Court held that the court may presume that the accused must have obtained them from the witness who a few minutes earlier was shown to have been in possession of the notes.[35] Where it was found that the persons behind the manufacturer and the buyer were the same, it was apparent that the buyer was associated with the manufacturer, i.e., the assessee and then regard being had to common course of natural events, human conduct and public and private business it could be presumed that they had interest, directly or indirectly, in the business of each other as per Section 114.[36]

Section 114 of the Evidence Act does not lay down any hard and fast rule for raising presumptions. It gives a few illustrations from various walks of life. The section provides a guiding principle, namely, that the court shall be led by its own experience and knowledge of the common course of natural events, and public and private affairs.[37]

This expression is appropriate in regard to such matters as the period of gestation or the continuance of life. The legitimacy of a child may have to be decided by reference to the term during which in the ordinary course of nature gestation may continue. A case of adultery must be judged having due regard to the social conditions and the manner in which the parties are accustomed to live. If there is evidence enough to show that they had reasonable opportunities of having sexual intercourse in the conditions of life in which they live for days together then the Court may be justified in raising an inference of adultery.[38] From the fact that a man and woman lived together for a number of years under the same roof a presumption can be drawn that they lived as husband and wife and their children were legitimate.[39] Where there is a long and continuous course of co-habitation between a man and woman, the law presumes in favour of marriage and against concubinage under this section, even in the absence of satisfactory direct evidence of marriage. Such presumption of marriage can only be repelled by evidence of the clearest character.[40] Failure to reply to a suit for maintenance creates a presumption that the man admits marriage.[41]

Under this section the Court is entitled, if it appears reasonable in all the circumstances of the case, to draw an inference that the accused committed a murder or took part in its commission, from the facts that he has been found in possession of the property proved to have been in the possession of the murdered person at the time of the murder or is able to point out the place where such property is concealed and admits having concealed it there and that he fails to give any explanation of his possession of the property, which can be accepted. The possession of stolen ornaments belonging to the murdered soon after the murder is, therefore, material evidence against the accused not only on the charge of robbery but also on the charge of murder.[42]

A Government servant was found in possession of assets disproportionate to his earnings and he was also not able to explain it, a presumption of corruption arose.[43] There was an allegation in an election petition that the respondent threatened voters with divine displeasure in his speeches. The petitioner did not produce any witness, nor notes made by him at the speeches. His assertion was presumed to be not true.[44] The statement of a judge as to what happened before a court or tribunal is generally presumed to be correct.[45] In case of preventive detention on the recommendation of an Advisory Board constituting a judge made after hearing lengthy arguments, it was held that the detention must be presumed to have been done on consideration of all material.[46] When an Income Tax Officer extended time for filing a return it must be presumed that extension was granted after satisfying himself that a case for extension was made out.[47]

The Allahabad High Court, dissenting from the view expressed in 1940 Peshawar 47, held that Section 114 itself does not consider the words "course of natural events" as interchangeable with animal conduct. If the words are not so interchangeable then it is obvious that the facts relating only to human conduct can be taken into consideration. The conduct of an animal, such as, a calf going to the house of its master and in starting to lick the udders of its mother does not appear to be covered by the term 'course of natural events'.[48]

Court can presume under Section 114 that in common course of natural events hemp can catch fire even without any misconduct on the part of the railway administration or its servants.[49]

In Civil and criminal cases, the court presumes the existence of facts based on the materials (documents and oral testimony) placed before it. Such presumptions are the result of the judge's own experience, human conduct, practices in public and private business as applies to the facts of the particular case.[50] As an example of an inference to be drawn from the conduct of a person the following is apposite. It is settled law that where property is entrusted to a servant, it is the duty of the servant to give a true account of what he does with the property so entrusted to him. If such servant fails to return the property or to account for, gives an account which is shown to be false and incredible, it is ordinarily a reasonable inference that he has criminally misappropriated the property so entrusted to him and dishonestly converted it to his own use. In such cases the court is entitled to draw hositle inferences and presumptions from the action and statements of the servant.[51]

Where one joint owner was permitted to be in possession for a long period of over 50 years and that too without any protest or objection, a presumption arose that he was the exclusive owner.[52]

A statement in a judgement as to things happening before the judge is not ordinarily permitted to be questioned.[53]

A catalogue which embodies a statement of the firm regarding the price at which it is prepared to sell its articles is not hearsay and is admissible in evidence in proof of the price.[54]

There is presumption that every person in his private character does his duty and unless the contrary is proved, it is presumed that all things are rightly and regularly done.[55]

4. NON-EXAMINATION OF A NUMBER OF WITNESSES

Where the prosecution did not examine a number of witnesses cited by the investigating agency, presumption cannot be drawn against the prosecution.[56]

5. NON-EXAMINATION OF INVESTIGATING OFFICER

In a criminal trial, non-examination of the investigating officer does not per se vitiate the trial.[57]

6. THEFT AND STOLEN GOODS [ILLUSTRATION (a)]

This illustration raises two presumptions, viz., that the person in possession of stolen goods soon after the theft is either (1) the thief, or (2) has received the goods knowing them to be stolen. The question as to which of the two presumptions is to be drawn will depend upon the facts of each particular case. This is a presumption which the court is not bound to draw but it is in the option of the court to draw it. But it does not, in any way, shift the burden of proof to the accused.

The presumption under this illustration arises only when the prosecution has established, (1) the ownership of the article in question, (2) theft of the article, and (3) its recent possession by the accused. Before a presumption can arise, it must necessarily be proved that the goods found in possession of the accused had been stolen.[58] Where the prosecution failed to prove that the theft of the ornaments of the deceased and their murder formed the part of the same transaction, no presumption could be drawn from their recovery from the possession of the accused that they had committed the murder.[59] The presumption contemplated in this illustration is not a presumption as to the fact of possession, but the presumption of guilt which arises from the accused not accounting for his possession of stolen goods which he is proved to be in possession soon after the theft. This presumption of guilt cannot, therefore, arise before such actual possession is proved, or before the accused, an opportunity being given, fails to account for his possession.[60]

The question whether presumption under Section 114, illus. (a) against the accused is a matter which depends upon the evidence and the circumstances of each case. Some of the circumstances are:—the nature of the recovered articles, the manner of their acquisition by the owner, the nature of evidence about their identification, the manner in which the articles were dealt with by the accused, the place and circumstances of their recovery, the length of the intervening period and the ability or otherwise of the accused to explain the recovery.[61]

A presumption of fact must be such as would naturally arise. Regard must be had to all the material circumstances before determining whether presumption could justifiably be drawn.[62]

The onus of proving all the ingredients of the offence charged, never shifts from the prosecution in cases in which a presumption under Section 114, illus. (a) can be invoked.[63]

The drawing of presumption under Section 114, illus. (a) is discretionary and a court may refuse in the special circumstances of a case to draw such a presumption.[64] Where the reliable evidence of the eye-witness had proved the guilt of dacoity against only the two accused, the five other accused found with looted property could not be held guilty of dacoity with murder.[65] Mere recovery of an article belonging to the deceased from the possession of the accused cannot connect him with the offence of murder by invoking this section.[66]

The presumption raised under illustration (a) of Section 114 does not contravene the provisions of Article 21 of the Constitution.[67]

Where there is no proof whether the moveable property of the deceased was found in possession of the accused, whether they were removed from the possession of the deceased during his life time or after his death, no presumption can be drawn under Illus. (a) of Section 114 that he was a thief or receiver of stolen property.[68] Where the accused snatched the attache containing cash by sprinkling chilli in the eyes of the victims who correctly identified them during the T.I. parade and the looted property was recovered as a result of their disclosure, presumption under Section 114 was attracted and involvement of the accused in the offence was proved.[69] In the absence of any other circumstance it is not possible to raise a presumption by invoking illustration (a) to S. 114 on the basis of the recovery that the accused is the person who committed the offence of murder, particularly when the recovery itself was doubtful.[70]

A property cannot be presumed to be stolen property simply because it was purchased by the purchaser at a throw away price.[71]

The Supreme Court has held that the presumption permitted to be drawn under this illustration has to be read with the important time-factor.[72] If the gap of time is too large, the presumption that the accused was concerned with the crime itself gets weakened. The presumption is stronger when the discovery of the fruits of crime is made immediately after the crime is committed.[73] The question what period is covered by the expression "soon after" depends upon the circumstances of each case. The court is not bound to draw this presumption, and it must always ask itself whether in the circumstances of the particular case the presumption is one which in fairness to the accused can be drawn.[74] In a subsequent decision the Supreme Court held that one year gap between murder and recovery did not destroy the presumption that the person in possession was himself the robber and murderer. Recent possession is a question of fact. No time-limit can be prescribed.[75] Where stolen articles of a very common description, consisting of jewellery of a very ordinary type and by no means of distinctive appearance, were found in the possession of a person six months after the commission of a dacoity, such possession was not deemed sufficient to call upon the accused to explain his possession. Where a stolen old brass bell was found in the possession of an old iron dealer thirteen days after the theft, the presumption under this section was not drawn. It was held similarly where a stolen buffalo was found in the possession of a person four or five months of the theft.[76]

The plain meaning of illus. (a) to Section 114 is that both presumptions are possible and which of the two should be adopted in a case depends upon the circumstances. If the interval between the theft and the accused being found in possession of the stolen articles is very small, the presumption can be that he is the thief. If, on the other hand, the interval is relatively long, the presumption can be that he is the receiver. If the interval is very long, the court may not even draw any presumption.[77] Mere recovery of jewelleries etc. belonging to the informant after two months of the occurrence from the accused was not sufficient to convict them for murder by taking recourse to the presumption under Section 114, illustration (a) but they could be convicted under Section 411, I.P.C.[78]

Accused was found in possession of stolen goods within two days of theft. He failed to furnish any explanation for his possession. Held that, the presumption under illus. (a) of Section 114 can be drawn and the accused can be convicted under Section 411, IPC, as receiver of stolen property.[79] The accused was charged for receiving stolen cycle. The alleged document showing that the cycle was pledged with him, was not proved. He did not give any explanation with regard to other cycles found in his possession. Held that, a presumption under Section 114, illus. (a) could be raised and the accused can be convicted under Section 411, I.P.C.[80]

The mere fact of recent possession of stolen property is, in general, evidence of theft, not of receipt of stolen property with guilty knowledge.[81] It would be a reasonable presumption that people had committed theft or burglary if they were seen the next day with the stolen property in circumstances which suggested that they were dividing up the booty. Such an inference would not be an inference of law; it would be a pure inference of fact. It would be open to the accused to explain that they were there for some purpose, but in the absence of such explanation, the presumption will be that they had taken part in the offence.[82]

As soon as the prosecution produces evidence to the effect that the person has been found in possession of the money stolen, the presumption at once arises under Section 114 that the possessor is either a thief or the receiver of the stolen property and this presumption when unexplained shall be regarded as conclusive fact.[83]

Presumption whether a person is a thief or receiver of stolen property depends upon facts and circumstances of each case. The accused, found in possession of Telegraph Wires, denied recovery but gave no satisfactory explanation of their possession. Held that the accused can be presumed to be received of stolen goods.[84]

Where the incriminating article is one which may change hands quite frequently and is commonly available and the recoveries were made nearly four months after theft, presumption under Section 114 illus. (a) cannot be raised against the accused.[85]

When the recovery was after six months it can be said to be of recent possession, unless explained by the accused.[86]

The words 'receives' and 'retains' are generally used together and though illus. (a) expressly refers to dishonest receipt of stolen property, a presumption about dishonest retention of the stolen property may equally be made by virtue of that illustration even though in the charge it is stated that the accused dishonestly received (not retained) the stolen property.[87]

In order to rebut the presumption under Section 114, illus. (a) as regards recent possession of stolen goods by the accused, the explanation of the accused of such possession must be so reasonably convincing as to throw a doubt on his guilt; but a mere denial of the prosecution story, or any assertion inconsistent with facts proved by the prosecution cannot amount to an explanation to make the presumption unavailable to the prosecution.[88]

Where the accused was found merely sitting in a taxi after it was stolen, they cannot be in possession of the taxi; the presumption against them of theft does not arise.[89] Where ornaments were recovered from an open filed which is accessible to all and sundry, it cannot be concluded that the accused was in possession of these articles as there is presumption of innocence of the accused and heavy onus rests on the prosecution to dislodge the presumption.[90] Even though the place where the articles were discovered was accessible to others, the fact that those articles were burried till the accused dug them out, shows that he must have burried them there.[91] Though the stolen property was not recovered from the house of the accused, but there was evidence to show that the articles were secreted in a bush and brought out by the accused, it was held that the property was in possession of the accused.[92] A watchman was murdered and jewels were robbed. There was evidence to show that the accused was present at the time of murder. Later the stolen jewels were recovered at his instance from a hidden place in his house. His conviction under Section 302 read with Section 392 of IPC is proper.[93]

Contraband gold was being carried on the person of the nephew of the accused. Both were travelling together. It was held that the newphew was used as the instrument of uncle's possession and the nephew was carrying the gold for the uncle.[94]

Presumption under Section 114, illus. (a) is discretionary and may not be available in all cases. Where the factum of theft and recent possession was proved but there was no evidence to show that the property was in possession of someone else before it passed into the hands of the accused, presumption would be that the accused is either a thief or a receiver of a stolen property.[95]

If a stolen property, almost at the moment it is stolen, is passed on by the thief to a companion, the proper inference to be drawn is that the second person (companion) is in concert with the thief and not that he merely received the stolen property.[96]

No presumption under Section 114, illus. (a) can be drawn from the mere fact that the stolen medicine, was recovered from a box kept underneath the accused's bed-sheet unless the prosecution also proves that no one other than the accused had access thereto.[1]

If the court comes to the conclusion on facts that the accused has hidden the property, one important step in resorting to the aid of illus. (a) to Section 114, namely possession, is satisfied.[2] In order to draw presumption under Section 114, illus. (a), proof of possession of stolen goods but not of possession of the place where those goods were hidden and found, is necessary.[3]

A presumption arises against a person found in possession of stolen goods soon after theft. The word 'possession' as used in Section 114(a), implies not only dominion but also consciousness in the mind of the person having such dominion. Where the facts prove exclusive possession, mere knowledge is enough to prove 'dominion' but where the facts indicate 'joint possession', there should be something in the evidence to show that this knowledge is not mere knowledge but guilty knowledge.[4] Where articles belonging to the deceased family were recovered from the possession of the accused soon after the incident which they could not explain and the murder and robbery of the articles were found to be part of the same transaction, it could be concluded that the accused and none else had committed murders and robbery.[5] Where property stolen in dacoity was recovered from the accused within 24 hours of the incident, inference as to the commission of dacoity could be drawn against them.[6]

Mere fact of knowledge of the accused of the existence of stolen property in a certain place accessible to all is not conclusive proof of possession of those articles by the accused.[7]

7. JOINT POSSESSION

But to raise this presumption legitimately, the possession of the stolen property should be exclusive as well as recent. If, for instance, the articles stolen were found on the person of the accused, or in a locked-up house or room, or in a box of which he kept the key, there would be fair ground for calling on him for his defence; but if they were found lying in a house or room in which he lived jointly with others equally capable with himself of the theft, or in an open box to which others had access, this would raise no definite presumption of his guilt.[8]

A postman was charged under Section 52, Post Offices Act, for secreting certain registered articles in an almirah of the house in which the accused lived jointly with his father. The prosecution proved that those articles were found in the almirah. The key of the almirah was with the father. The circumstances that the almirah contained, as part of the registered articles in question, certain other articles belonging to the accused cannot sustain an inference that the almirah was in the exclusive possession of the accused or even in the joint possession with his father. The fact that the accused had opportunity to get at the articles is not sufficient to infer exclusive possession of the articles by the accused. No presumption can, therefore be drawn against the accused that he had secreted them from the mere fact that the articles were found in the almirah which, at best, may be regarded as being in the joint possession of the accused and his father. But even an inference of joint possession would not be legitimate.[9]

Where a husband was storing looted property in the house and the wife was merely acquiescing in keeping such property, she cannot be regarded as a passive partner in the crime and a charge under Section 412, IPC., cannot sustain against the wife.[10] Where the accused was residing in the house with other persons and stolen property was recovered from that house, no presumption can be drawn to hold him guilty under Section 411.[11] Where the stolen property is recovered from an open verandan which is in the joint possession of two accused, conviction of only one accused under Section 411, IPC., cannot be maintained.[12]

Where the stolen property is recovered from a house occupied by several persons, there can be no presumption that the place was in exclusive possession of the accused.[13] In the case of a family living jointly in the same house, the head of the family is presumed to be in possession of any such illicit article found in the house. Possession implies dominion and consciousness in the mind of the person having dominion over an object that he has it and that he can exercise it. Possession must be conscious and intelligent possession and not merely the physical presence of the accused in proximity or even in close proximity to the object. There is no presumption that a father or head of family is in possession of everything contained in his house; neither can it be presumed that he is having control of anything so found. Grave miscarriage of justice, might follow from the application of such a rule. A virtuous father might have the misfortune of having a son living with him, who is an unmitigated rascal and if this presumption is to be made, this virtuous father must be presumed to be in possession of everything brought by the rascal son into the house.[14] Merely because the accused is the head of a family and owner of the house, he cannot be presumed to have constructive knowledge of the hidden instrument used for the offence.[15]

The mere fact that an accused person points out the place in which the stolen property is concealed does not give rise to any presumption under this section or justify his conviction for the offence of receiving stolen property, still less for the offence of theft.[16] But where property forming part of the stolen property is produced by a person from his house, a presumption under it can be drawn against him.[17]

When an accused makes a statement, "I have concealed the property at a particular place and I will produce it", and if it is discovered in consequence of that statement, it is evidence of his possession, even though the stolen articles are kept or concealed in another man's property, because unless he had possession he would not have kept them at that place. Where, however, an accused without stating that he has concealed stolen property merely produces it from a place to which other people can have access, it is not sufficient to establish his possession even though the property may be concealed, because it is consistent with any other person having done so and the accused may have merely knowledge of it.[18]

Recovery in pursuance of information is an important piece of evidence. The only evidence against an accused person was that stolen properties were recovered, on the information given by him, from a hollow of a tree situated in a jungle. Since the land on which the tree stood or the tree itself did not belong to the accused, the mere recovery cannot show that he was in possession of the stolen property or that, after committing the theft, he had kept the article inside the tree.[19] In a case of murder by poisoning, the recovery of incriminating articles from a place which is easily accessible to exertnal agency and not in the exclusive possession of the accused or the articles are not in the exclusive use of the accused, the recovery cannot treated as incriminating piece of evidence.[20] The mere recovery of the articles at the instance of the accused and the absence of any explanation by him as to how he came to know the place of hiding, is not sufficient for the court to conclude that the accused had placed the articles there and he could not have got information is some other manner about the presence of the articles at that place.[21]

Unless the connection between the articles alleged to have been stolen and those recovered from the house of the accused has been established, no presumption could be drawn under Section 114(a) either that the person is the thief or receiver of stolen articles.[22]

8. UNLESS HE CAN ACCOUNT FOR HIS POSSESSION

The words "unless he can account for his possession" do not mean that any sort of explanation in regard to possession would be acceptable. The explanation offered must be reasonable. The words do not mean that the accused must prove it positively that he had received the property in the manner indicated by him.[23]

The accused denied the circumstantial evidence and kept silent. This suggests that the accused had nothing which he had to explain. Held, that in such a case the court cannot assume that the accused had refused to offer an explanation on the ground that he had a right to keep silent.[24]

The words "can account for its possession" do not mean that the accused must prove it positively that he received the property in the manner indicated by him. If the explanation given is not inherently improbable or palpably false and the court or the jury trying the case find it to be reasonably true, the adverse presumption shall be deemed to have been rebutted. The meaning of the words "reasonably true" appears to be that the explanation must be sufficient to cast a doubt on the guilt of the accused and in that case unless the prosecution proves beyond reasonable doubt that the accused received the property knowing it to be stolen, the benefit of the doubt shall go to him.[25] This illustration does not mean that the burden of proof is shifted on to the accused,[26] so that he must prove affirmatively that he came by the goods innocently. It is sufficient if he can give an explanation which may raise a doubt in the mind of the court as to the guilt of the accused, which in the opinion of the court may possibly be true.

But the possession of stolen property even if accompanied by a failure to give an account as to how such possession was acquired, or by a false account, or by accounts which are contradictory, or by a concealment of the property, would raise not a violent or strong presumption, but a probable presumption merely.[27] It is not the law that if the accused fails to account for his possession of the goods said to be stolen, he must be convicted, if the other proved facts of the case do not predicate guilt. The accused is not required to prove his explanation by adducing substantive evidence. In many cases it may be impossible for him to do so, particularly if he alone knows the facts, for he is not bound to give evidence on oath on his own behalf.[28]

Where a conviction under Section 411 of the Indian Penal Code was based on the presumption aforesaid, the court saying that the burden of proving his *bona fide*s was thrown on the accused and that the oral testimony on behalf of the accused to prove that he had purchased the goods from a certain person was not very reliable, it was held that the conviction was legal.[29] Where a calf belonging to another person was purchased by the accused for an inadequate price, just after a day it was stolen, and the accused is unable to explain as to how he came to be in possession of it, the inference that the accused knew it to be stolen property can be reasonably drawn.[30] If circumstances indicate that possession was not in natural course of things, the fact that a false explanation is given by accused renders prosecution case stronger.[31]

In an offence under Section 411, IPC., the possession of the stolen articles by the accused was recent, but the explanation was given by him raising serious doubts about sustainability of the charge. Held that the accused was entitled to acquittal.[32] Where the explanation of the accused is plausible and satisfactory, presumption under Section 114 does not arise.[33]

The burden case on the accused by Section 114, illus. (a) to account satisfactorily for his possession of stolen property is not so onerous as the burden on the prosecution to prove the offence beyond all reasonable doubt in every respect. If the accused offers no explanation, the court may infer guilty knowledge. But, if the explanation leaves the court in doubt, the accused should be held not guilty.[34]

The presumption under Section 114, illus. (a) can be raised only if the person found in possession is unable to account for his possession.[35]

When the charge is under Section 411 of I.P.C., and the accused denies knowledge of the fact that the goods in his possession were stolen, the question is whether a prudent man ought, under the circumstances of the particular case, to act on the supposition that the accused had that knowledge.[36]

If the explanation offered by the accused person is plausible although a court or a jury may not be convinced of its truth, the accused is entitled to an acquittal. The prosecution must show that the explanation is false.[37]

It is not for the accused to prove beyond all reasonable doubt that his explanation if the possession is true. It is enough if the explanation is one which appears to the court to be reasonable.[38]

9. EXTENTION OF THE PRINCIPLE—NOT CONFINED TO THEFT ONLY

The presumption in this illustration is not confined to the charge of theft, but extends to all charges, however, penal not excluding even murder. Therefore, where a person charged with dacoity is shown to have been in possession of part of the stolen property soon after the dacoity, it may be presumed that he was one of the dacoits or that he received the property knowing it to have been stolen at the dacoity. The principle of illu. (a) applies not only to cases of ordinary theft but also to cognate offences such as dacoity and robbery. The presumption arising under this illustration extends to all charges, however penal, including murder.[39]

No hard and fast rule can be laid down as to what inference should be drawn from a certain circumstances. Where, however, the only evidence against the accused is the recovery of stolen property, though may indicate that the theft and murder must have been committed at the same time, it is not safe to draw the inference that the person in possession of stolen property was the murderer. Suspicion cannot take the place of proof. Unexplained recovery of the articles from the house of the accused may lead to the only inference that he is either a receiver of stolen property or a person who committed theft, but it does not necessarily indicate that the theft and murder took place at one and the same time.[40]

The accused was found in possession of property of a murdered person on the day of murder. The accused could not offer any satisfactory explanation as to how he came to be in possession of the property. It was held that the circumstantial evidence was sufficient to hold the accused responsible for the murder.[41] Where ornaments or things of the deceased are found in the possession of a person soon after the murder a presumption of guilt may be permitted. If several months expire in the interval, presumption may not be permitted to be drawn having regard to the circumstances of the case.[42] It was held that where the accused was charged for murder and robbery, the mere fact that a period of one year had lapsed for the recovery would not lead to the presumption that the accused was only a receiver of stolen property and had not committed the murder, particularly when the accused was absconding during that period; presumption can be drawn that he committed both murder and robbery.[43]

Ornaments of the deceased were recovered at the instance of the accused. Those ornaments were worn by the deceased when last seen. Inference that the accused must have murdered the deceased cannot be drawn in the absence of any evidence to connect him with murder. Onus lies on the prosecution to prove its case. The accused is liable to be convicted under Section 411 and not under Section 302 or Section 394, I.P.C.[44]

However, Rajasthan High Court held that if theft and murder are inter-connected and the stolen property was recovered from the accused, presumption of murder can be raised.[45]

Where the accused was found to be in possession of the ornaments of the deceased victim, it was held that the presumption under Section 114 could be applied to convict the accused for theft but could not be availed of for conviction of murder in the absence of any linking evidence.[46]

The presumption from the possession of articles belonging to the deceased by the accused persons immediately after the murder or robbery should be drawn only where some evidence in present to show that the accused persons were seen with the deceased immediately before his death or that the deceased was last seen alive in the company of the accused persons.[47] Where stolen articles were recovered at the instance of the accused soon after the occurrence of the dacoity, the accused is liable to be convicted not only under Section 412, I.P.C., but also under Section 391, I.P.C. with the aid of Section 114.[48]

When possession of the recovered property with the accused was not established he could not be convicted under Section 395, I.P.C. on the basis of presumption under Section 114(a).[49]

Where stolen goods were recovered from the accused three days after docity, possible presumption are:—

(1) he took part in the dacoity;

(2) received goods knowing them to be stolen, in the dacoity.

Choice of presumption depends upon the facts of each case.[50]

Where an article taken away by the dacoits was found in the possession of the accused after about two months of the dacoity, it would not be either fair or safe to draw the presumption that he took part in the dacoity.[51]

It was held that where a rifle was recovered five months after the dacoity no presumption can be drawn.[52]

There is no rule of law which permits from the possession of stolen goods, a presumption of an offence of lurking house prespass by night or house-breaking by night (Section 457 of I.P.C.).[53]

Where accused was in possession of a large quantity of heroin, it was held that it can be presumed that it was illegally imported for distribution. In the case of possession of cocaine, however, it was held that no presumptin of illegal importation can be drawn as it is lawfully purchased in large quantities in the United States.[54]

Presumption arises as soon as it is shown that accused had received the stated amount and such amount was not the legal remuneration. It is not necessary that before presumption arises prosecution must prove that money was paid as a bribe.[55]

Before any presumption is drawn the attention of the accused should be drawn to the particular recoveries made from each of them in the dacoity case.[56] Before a presumption could be drawn against an accused, he has to be asked to account for his possession.[57]

10. TESTIMONY OF ACCOMPLICE [ILLUSTRATION (b)]

An accomplice is one who is a guilty associate in crime. Where the witness sustains such a relation to the criminal act that he could be jointly indicted with the accused, he is an accomplice.[58] It is a rule of prudence and practice which practically amounts to a rule of law that the evidence of an accomplice ought not be acted upon unless it is corroborated as against the particular accused in material respects.[59]

Corroborative evidence is evidence which shows or tends to show that the story of the accomplice that the accused committed the crime is true, not merely that the crime has been committed, but that it was committed by the accused.[60]

The confession of a co-accused cannot be used to corroborate the evidence of an accomplice.[61]

The corroboration in the case of an accomplice must point to the identification of the person charged with the particular act with which the direct evidence connects him.[62] The corroboration in material particulars must be such as to connect or identify each of the accused with the offence.[63]

The evidence of an accomplice ought to be regarded with suspicion. The degree of suspicion which will attach to it must vary according to the extent and nature of the complicity.[64] There should be such corroboration of the accomplice's evidence as will satisfy a prudent person that the approver can be regarded as a truthful person. The corroboration may even be by circumstantial evidence. The nature of the corroboration will depend on and vary with the circumstances of each case.[65] "...It is not necessary that there should be independent corroboration of every material circumstance. All that is required is that there must be some additional evidence rendering it probable that the story of the accomplice or the complainant is true and that it is reasonably safe to act upon it and the corroboration need not be by direct evidence. It is sufficient if it is merely circumstantial evidence of the connection of the accused with the crime.[66]

Where the accomplice is not really a criminal but a spy or informer his evidence does not require any corroboration.[67]

The rule in this illustration is to be read along with Section 133 which states "An accomplice shall be a competent witness against an accused person; and a conviction is not illegal merely because it proceeds upon the uncorroborated testimony of an accomplice." Neither rule is to be ignored in the exercise of judicial discretion. In point of law an accomplice is a competent witness against an accused person (vide Section 133). But great caution in weighing his testimony is dictated by prudence and reason. Unless the case is a very exceptional one, an accomplice's evidence should not be accpeted as being sufficient.[68]

In England it is regarded as the settled course of practice not to convict a prisoner, except under very special circumstances, upon un-corroborated testimony of an accomplice.[69] The corroboration which the common law requires is corroboration in some material particular tending to show that the accused committed the crime charged. It is not enough that the corroboration shows the witness to have told the truth in matters unconnected with the guilt of the accused.[70]

One accomplice cannot corroborate another. However, if several accomplices simlutaneously and without previous concert give a consistent account of the crime implicating the accused, the court may accept the several statements as corroborating each other, but it must be established that the several statements of accomplices were given independently and without any previous concert.[71]

It is now well-settled that the minimum amount of corroboration required to make it safe to act on the testimony of an approver is that the evidence must be corroborated not only as to the corpus delicti but also as to the identity of the accused persons. The corroborative evidence must show or tend to show that the story of the approver that the accused committed the crime is true; in other words, the corroborative evidence must be such which confirms not only the evidence that the crime has been committed but also the evidence that the accused committed that crime.[72] In a case where there are a large number of accused it is essential that the evidence of an accomplice be corroborated by evidence which implicates each of the accused individually. Independent evidence which corroborates the evidence of an accomplice so far as one of several co-accused is concerned is not necessarily evidence which corroborates the statement of the accomplice so far as the other accused are concerned.[73] All that is required is that there must be some additional evidence rendering it probable that the story of the accomplice is true. Corroboration can also be both by direct or circumstantial evidence.[74]

The Bombay High Court has laid down the following four principles with regard to the nature and extent of corroboration:

(1) that it is not necessary that there should be independent confirmation of every material particular;

(2) that independent evidence must not only make it safe to believe that the crime was committed, but in some way reasonably connect or tend to connect the accused with it by confirming in some material particular the testimony of the accomplice complainant that the accused committed the crime;

(3) that the corroboration must come from independent scources; and

(4) that the corroboration need not be direct evidence that the accused committed the crime—it is sufficient if it is merely circumstantial evidence of his connection with crime.[75]

Where the evidence of an accomplice is not totally unsupported by re-assuring circumstances, the accused could be convicted on the basis of such evidence.[76] Where the evidence of the approver was that he participated in the commission of the offence but not to the same extent as the main accused, his statement could not be said to be of exculpatory nature and on that score his statement could not be excluded from consideration.[77] Where the testimony of the approver was corroborated in respect of only the Accused-1 and not in respect of the Accused-2, conviction of the former was upheld but the later was given benefit of doubt.[78]

Rape Cases.—The Supreme Court of India has held that though a woman who has been raped is not an accomplice, her evidence has been treated by the courts on somewhat similar lines, and the rule which requires corroboration of such evidence save in exceptional circumstances has now hardened into law.[79] The view that though corroboration should ordinarily be required in the case of a grown up woman, it is unnecessary in the case of a child of tender years is not correct. The true position is that in every case of this type the rule about the advisability of corroboration should be present to the mind of the Judge; whether corroboration is unnecessary is a question of fact in every case.[80] As a rule of prudence the Court normally looks for some corroboration of her testimony so as to satisfy its conscience that she is telling the truth and that the person accused of rape on her has not been falsely implicated.[81] The above statement of law is substantially altered by Section 114-A of this Act where in certain circumstances, the Court should presume that a woman did not consent to rape where she states in her evidence that she did not consent. In other words the court has to prima facie proceed that her evidence is true. In a case of rape, absence of injuries or the accused on the prosecutrix per se is not sufficient to indicate her consent.[82]

Where an alleged rapist gave evasive replies and gave no explanation about the injury on his penis and human blood on his pant, adverse inference could be drawn against him.[83]

11. BILL OF EXCHANGE [ILLUSTRATION (c)]

The presumption on which this illustration is founded is in accordance with the maxim omnia praesumuntur rite esse acta, i.e., all things are presumed to be done in due form. The principle of the maxim "has, in many instances, been recognised in support of the solemn acts of even private persons.... Thus, if an act can only be lawful after the performance of some prior act, due performance of that prior act will be presumed. Again, although in the case of contracts not under seal a consideration must in general be averred and proved, yet bills of exchange and promissory notes enjoy the privilege of being presumed, prima facie, to be founded on a valuable consideration. The law raises this presumption in favour of these instruments, partly because it is important to preserve their negotiability intact, and partly because the existence of a valid consideration may reasonably be inferred from the solemnity of the instruments themselves, and the deliberate mode in which they were executed. (TAYLOR 12th Edn., S. 148, p. 139).

An effect of the presumption is that the plaintiff has not to produce account books to substantiate consideration. The burden is upon the other party.[84]

The explanation to this illustration speaks of "a man of business", which in its well-known popular sense must mean a man habitually engaged in mercantile transactions or trade.[85]

Sections 118 and 119 of the Negotiable Instruments Act lay down certain other presumptions. The Lahore High Court has held that Section 118 of the Negotiable Instruments Act replaces the explanation attached to this illustration and therefore the rule laid down in this illustration is modified by Section 118. What was permissible in the Evidence Act was converted into a statutory obligation in the Negotiable Instruments Act. While illustration (c) is confined to the acceptance or endorsement of a bill of exchange, Section 118 of the Negotiable Instruments Act applies to the making or drawing of it also.[86]

The Madras High Court has held that the difference between this section and Section 118 of the Negotiable Instruments Act consists only in this, that under the first, the court has a discretion to make the presumption or not, whereas, under the second, the Court is bound to start with the presumption; but once the presumption is made there is no difference between the cases; in the manner of displacing the presumption or disproving the "presumed" fact. Any presumption as to quantum of consideration as distinguished from the mere existence of consideration, has accordingly to be drawn, not by virtue of Section 118 of the Negotiable Instruments Act or even under this section, but only from the recitals, if any, that the instrument may contain. As to such recitals, it has long been established that that being prima facie evidence against the parties to the instruments, they may operate to shift on the party pleading the contrary, the burden of rebuting the inference raised by them. But the weight due to recitals may vary according to circumstances and, in particular circumstances, the burden of rebutting them may become very light, especially when the court is not satisfied that the transaction was honest and bona fide.[87]

Section 118 of the Negotaiable Instruments Act enacts a special rule of evidence which operates between parties to the instrument or persons claiming under them in a suit or proceeding relaing to the bill of exchange and does not affect the rule contained in this section in cases not falling within Section 118 of the Negotiable Instruments Act.[88]

Where the drawer issued an undated cheque as security for loan transaction, the issuance of the cheque was admitted and there was no dispute regarding signature, amount and the name shown in the cheque, it could be presumed that the cheque was supported by consideration which presumption could not be rebutted merely because there were some transactions between the drawer and the drawee of the cheque.[89] It can be presumed that insertion of date in an undated cheque by the payee holder of the cheque is with the implied consent of the drawer of the cheque.[90] Presumption of due execution of a pronote by an illiterate woman could be drawn if one respectable witness proved the same, though another witness denied it when he was not a reliable witness.[91] Presumption under Section 114, illus. (c) can be raised in case presumption under Section 118(a) of the Negotiable Instruments Act is not available.[92]

Where the plaintiff withholds relevant evidence presumption under Section 118 of the Negotiable Instruments Act is rebutted.[93] If the defendant shows that the cash consideration originally pleaded for the hundi did not pass, he must be taken to have discharged the onus which lay upon him in view of the presumption, that is attached to the hundi as a Negotiable Instrument. The onus then shifts on the plaintiff to prove that there was consideration.[94]

12. CONTINUANCE [ILLUSTRATION (d)]

This illustration is founded on the presumption which exists in favour of continuance or immutability.

If a thing or a state of things is shown to exist, an inference of its continuity within a reasonably proximate time both forwards and backwards may sometimes be drawn. The rule that the presumption of continuance may operate retrospectively also had been recognised in India. How far the presumption may be drawn backwards and forwards depends upon the nature of the thing and surrounding circumstances.[1]

Sections 107 and 109 deal with particular applications of the principle of which this illustration is the general expression.

The oridinary legal presumption is that things remain in their original state.[2] If a person is shown at one time to be a member of a joint Hindu Family, it will be held under this illustration that he never separated at all unless the contrary is proved. Presumption should not be raised against but in favour of the existing state of things.[3] A State of affairs which is shown to exist at one time in the past is presumed to continue as it is.[4] Entries in Khatauni as to occupration of a particular person raise a presumption as to contunity of possession of that person and the presumption is not nautralised by payment of rent by some one else.[5] A momentary delivery of possession, even of real possession and not of symbolic possession, not followed up by subsequent possession and enjoyment, will not raise, in the case of cultivated land, the presumption that it is continued for years.[6]

There is no scope for any presumption under Section 114(d) to hold that the value ruling at the time of previous assessment remained unchanged even during the time of revaluation, when the assessee himself had admitted that the value had increased.[7]

13. JUDICIAL AND OFFICIAL ACTS [ILLUSTRATION (e)]

The rule emboided in this illustration flows from the maxim omnia praesumtuntur rite et solemniter esse acta i.e., all acts are resumed to have been rightly and regularly done. "The true principle intended to be conveyed by the rule, 'omina praesumuntur rite et solemniter esse acta,'... seems to be, that there is a general disposition in the court of justice to uphold official, judicial, and other acts, rather than to render them inoperative, and with this view, where there is general evidence of acts having been legally and regularly done, to dispense with the proof of circumstances, strictly speaking essential to the validity of those acts, and by which they were probably accompanied in most instances, although in other the assumption rests solely on gounds of public policy."[8]

This illustration only means that, if an official act is proved to have been done, it will be presumed to have been regularly done, but it does not raise any presumption that an act was done for which there is no evidence and proof.[9] The presumption under Section 114(e) is that of the regularity of the official acts whether judicial or executive, and not that of the acts themselves being done. The presumption is rebuttable.[10]

It is a settled law that in interpreting the Constitution neither motives nor bad faith nor abuse of power be presumed unless in an individual case it is assailed and arises for consideration on that premise. On the contrary, the presumption is that official acts have been regularly performed.[11]

Illus. (e) to Section 114 permits presumption to be drawn in matters of procedure. It does not permit a presumption to be drawn where the question does not relate to the manner of doing an official act but goes to the root of the validity of that order.[12] In a case regarding land acquisition, non-impleadment of the Land Acquisition Officer, will give rise to the presumption under Section 114(e).[13] The presumption that official acts must be presumed to have done in accordance with rules and laws is not a conclusive one and is not available where there is a clear evidence to the contrary.[14] The normal presumption that all official acts are properly performed must be always recognised and given effect to in the absence of evidence to the contrary.[15] There would be a presumption of regularity in respect of official and judicial acts and it would be for the party who challenges that regularity to plead and prove his case. In this case it was contended on behalf of an advocate who was found guilty of professional misconduct that the Bar Council was not consulted before referring the matter to the District Judge for enquiry. It was held that the fact that in the order of reference to the District Judge there is no explicit statement that the Bar Council had previously been consulted is not decisive on the point.[16] Courts will normally presume that a discretion vested in a Government functionary has been exercised fairly, and this presumption is stronger still when the discretion is vested in the highest executive authority of all, the Governor of the State.[17]

Illustration (e) means that act has been done with due care and attention.[18]

Whether a presumption should or should not be made must depend upon the particular circumstances of each case.[19]

Where a statement appears in the judgement of a court that a particular thing happened or did not happen before it, it ought not ordinarily to be permitted to be challenged by a party unless both the parties to the litigation agree that the statement is wrong, or the court itself admits that the statement is erroneous.[20] A presumption arises under this section as to legality and correctness of a court's proceedings.[21] The very fact that a Magistrate convicted and sentenced the accused raises a presumption that the accused was not a minor at the time he was convicted. It is for the accused to rebut that very strong presumption.[22] Every judicial tribunal set up by a statute must be deemed to act properly and within powers conferred on it by the Legislature.[23] Presumption that the court performed its duty arises and onus is on the party alleging non-compliance by the court within Order XXXII, Rule 7 of the C.P.C., to prove that no leave was obtained for compromise.[24] There is a presumption that an order made by a court of law was made after considering all the material on record and after hearing both sides.[25] There is a presumption that the evidence was read over to the witness, interpreted and admitted by the witness to be correct in view of the endorsement certified by the court at the bottom of the deposition.[26] When it is stated in the order sheet that a certain order was read out and explained to persons proceeded against, it should be assumed that it was read out and explained.[27] As there is a presumption in law that court proceedings have been regularly conducted and it must be presumed that oath had been duly administered to the witness when he appeared in the witness box for giving evidence.[28]

When the records show that notices have been sent it must ordinarily be presumed that statutory requirements have been complied with and statutory notices given.[29] When the entry in the order sheet shows that notice has been served, it is prima facie evidence of the fact that notice has been served.[30] Where the Magistrate did not record in the order sheet the ascertainment of intactness of seal and mark and non-tampering of signature of the accused of the sample received from Local Health Authority before sending it to the Director of Central Food Laboratory which was not challenged before the Magistrate, presumption of regular performance of judicial act could be drawn.[31] If there is difference between the facts recorded in the order sheets and the statement of any party to a proceeding, where the facts recorded in the order sheet must be held to represent the correct state of affairs.[32]

But in the undermentioned cases it was held that entries in suit registers showing that notices were issued do not mean that the notices were served. Such entries by themselves cannot prove service.[33] The mere entry in the order sheet is no proof that the notice had been served.[34] When there is no mention of a contention in the judgements of courts the presumption is that contention was not put forth and urged.[35]

Presumption of regularity of acts extends to testamentary documents.[36]

The statement of an arbitrator as to amount of fees he received must be presumed to be correct.[37]

The presumption under Section 114(e) is a rebuttable one and once it is rebutted by the party challenging the settlement, the onus would be on the successful party to support the settlement.[38]

Where the officer concerned did not depose as to the compliance of the mandatory procedure under S. 50 of the N.D. & P.S. Act to inform the accused of his right to be searched in the presence of a Gazetted Officer or a Magistrate, the Court could presume that the possession of illicit articles by the accused was not established.[39]

Where some of the teachers, appointed under Intermediate Education Act, did not possess the requisite experience for promotion, their appointment could not be presumed to have been made by promotion. However their appointment, being governed by statutory regulation, is an official act and presumption of regularity attaches to it.[40] Where the record of the selection committee showed that the selection was based on merit but the same was challenge after eight years, the presumption of the genuineness of the official acts would apply.[41] Where the Additional Advocate General filed the special appeals on behalf of the State Govt., it could be presumed that he was duly authorised to file the said appeals.[42] Burden of proving that formalities required by law were not complied with at the time of giving symbolic possession to plaintiff, is on the defendant and not on plaintiff, as there was presumption in favour of plaintiff.[43] Where a copy of sale certificate is affixed in a conspicious place of one plot, there can be no presumption that affixture as required by law was made in respect of all plots if all of them are not in one place.[44] Where there is a defect in the proclamation of sale, the judgment debtor cannot be presumed to have information about the defective proclamation of sale.[45] The order of detention passed by the Deputy Commissioner is without jurisdiction. Doctrine of presumption of regularity cannot be invoked to presume that he acted in his capacity as District Magistrate.[46]

It may be presumed that the official act of forwarding of the report of the public analyst with necessary intimation has been performed regularly.[47]

When property is attached in execution of a decree, it can be presumed that the property was attached by the administration in accordance with the law.[48] Attachment must be presumed to be valid in the absence of proof to the contrary. Irregularities in attachment does not render it invalid.[49] Where a court has sent a copy of the order of attachment of agricultural lands to the collector's office for its publication, the Collector is presumed to have carried out his official duty of publishing the same as desired by the court.[50] When an assessee appears on the adjourned date of hearing without notice, inference is that the assessee did appear on the previous date of hearing and thereby acquired knowledge of the next date of hearing.[51] When the original suit agreement was lost from the custody of the court, and when the plea was not raised before the trial court that it was not properly stamped, it was held that it has to be presumed that the agreement was properly stamped and Section 35 of the Stamp Act has no application.[52] Presumption as to the validity of a compromise decree is that at the time when it was passed the court was satisfied that a valid compromise was arrived at there in between the parties thereto.[53]

14. ISSUE OF WARRANT PRESUMPTION AS TO

BEAUMONT. C.J. said "It is, I think, desirable that a warrant issued under the terms of a particular statute should show on its face that the conditions precedent required by the statute have been complied with, but it is not in my view essential that the warrant should so show. There is a presumption under Section 114, illus. (e), Evidence Act, which enables us to presume that the officer issuing the warrant has performed his duty correctly, and until that presumption is displaced, it is not, in my opinion, necessary for the officer to give any evidence in the matter."[54]

Where a warrant of arrest is on the face of it not defective the court would be entitled to draw a presumption in accordance with the provisions of Section 114(e).[55]

15. PRESUMPTION OF GOVERNMENT AND OFFICIAL ACTS

When law requires an act to be done in a particular manner and there is no evidence to the contrary, there is presumption that they have been performed in the manner provided in law.[56]

The factual recitals or observations made in a judgment or order are taken to be correct unless rebutted.[57] The matters of judicial record are unquestionable inasmuch as that they are not open to doubt. Hence is a case of divorce decree, the allegation by the wife that her signature on the petition was obtained per force, could not be entertained[58] but where it was found that the date hearing objection in the order sheet was a gazetted holiday, it was inferred that for preparing the manipulated order sheet some date was picked up at ran down which unfortunately turned out to be a gazetted holiday. Thereafter taking a false plea that objections were heard on a holiday and swearing in a false affidavit also by the Spl. Land Acquisition Officer do not raise a presumption that official acts are done in a regular manner[59] and ex parte decree cannot be presumed to be passed on merits.[60] In view of the Section 114, illustration (e), the act of the Appellate Authority rejecting the application for condonation of delay could be presumed to have been regularly performed, if nothing contrary was established.[61]

The presumption that all judicial and official acts would be regularly performed though is rebuttable yet it restrains to anticipate that the officers entrusted with statutory duty would act in contravention of law.[62] The presumption under Section 114(e) will come to the aid of the party, only if the party proves the fact that the judicial or official act has been, in effect, done or performed and that too in accordance with law.[63]

Official work is presumed to be correct unless faulted or disproved by cogent evidence.[64] Since there is a presumption that all official acts are properly done, it must be held that the Deputy Superintendent of Police who conduted the departmental enquiry had the authority to do so.[65] The presumption can be drawn, if the Court is satisfied that the action in question is traceable to a statutory power even when the authority concerned has omitted or committed an error in reciting the correct provision of law.[66]

Legislature must be presumed to know the facts and conditions rendering a statute expedient and beneficial.[67] Unless the contrary is proved the court has to presume that an impugned act has been validly enacted and that all the necessary formalities or its enactment have been duly complied with.[68] It must be presumed that in making nominations to the State Legislative Council, the Governor must have acted on the advice of his Council of Ministers. Court is entitled to presume regularity of official acts.[69] Where the Government issues a notification that a certain land is urgently required for public purposes, it may be presumed that the Government's decision on the issue of urgency is properly done.[70] When the Government accords sanction for prosecution, it is presumed that the official acts have been regularly performed.[71]

There is a presumption when a statutory authority makes an order, that it has followed the prescribed procedure.[72]

Where a Deputy Secretary to Government makes an order in his own right without authenticating it as issued in the name of the President, the order is not valid. The presumption of official act could not be invoked.[73] Where the Govt. authority made appointment of as many as 6000 odd employees without any written order i.e., without issuing any appointment letter, thus without following the prescribed procedure, the presumption under Section 114(e) does not get attracted.[74]

Presumption is that every public officer performs his duty honestly and in accordance with law.[75] Presumption of correctness arises in respect of those documents which were prepared and maintained by the public officers in due discharge of their duties as per requirement of rules.[76] Where mala fides or abuse of power is alleged in respect of an official act, the presumption is that officials discharge their duties honestly and in accordance with law. This presumption is heightened in the case of high officials occupying senior positions in contradistinction to minor and petty officials.[77] In a writ petition against Government, the burden of proof of the petitioner pleading mala fides is heavy. Presumption of proper performance of duty by a public servant cannot be rebutted by making mere vague allegations.[78] Where a statute has conferred the privilage of exercising discretion on a responsible officer the court can legitimately presume that he has not acted capriciously.[79]

Public Officers are assumed to act fairly. But this presumption holds goods only as long as the aggrieved party is not able to adduce facts proving the likelihood of discrimination.[80]

The court is entitled to presume that official acts have been performed in their regular course.[81] Courts are entitled to presume that Government orders have been made in due course of its authority.[82] Where the order of detention under J&K Public Safety Act was signed by the Additional Home Secretary to Government who was competent to sign the said order, there arises the presumption of its validity.[83]

There can be no presumption against the express provisions of law which are embodied in any statutory enactment or in any rules made under such enactments or even against principles enunciated in judicial precedents.[1]

In the absence of contrary evidence, the State Government should be presumed to act with complete propriety and without any bias.[2]

Entries in a birth registered maintained in a police station under U.P. Police regulations were presumed to be correct.[3] The presumption under Section 114, illus. (e) to the effect that the court may presume that official acts have been regularly performed is hardly applicable to an entry about the age in the electoral roll which is made on hearsay and is not verified or attested.[4]

Presumption of correctness attached to counting of votes is not destroyed when a single mistake is detected while counting ballot papers of an election.[5]

There is no necessity for drawing a presumption under Section 114(e) where the statute directs a document to be filed and the certificate shows on the face of it to have been filed. The filing is sufficiently proved by the certificate.[6]

A person who challenges a revenue sale, has to prove irregularities. Entries in books of Collector will be presumed to be correct under Section 114(e).[7] Entries in Collector's books are presumed to be correct having regard to illus. (e) and (f).[8]

There is presumption that an Act done by municipality has been done according to prescribed procedure.[9] The confidential reports submitted by the medical examiners of the Life Insurance Corporation will have to be accepted as true.[10] The certificate by Board of Censor is relevant but does not create a presumption that Sections 292 and 293 of I.P.C. are not violated.[11] When official act is done, it is presumed to have properly done.[12] Waxilmulars is a village administration paper prepared with due care after due enquiry by a public servant in the discharge of his official duty and so presumption of correctness attachees to it.[13] Where the business of the Government relating to the state affairs was published in Government publiction, it may be presumed to be correct unless rebutted.[14] Before any presumption can attract to an order under Defence of India Rules, it must be shown to be, on the fact of it, regular and to conform to the provisions of the rule under which it purports to have been made.[15] Where an order passed by the authority has been published by it in the Official Gazette, it may be presumed that it was aware of the provisions of Rule 119, Defence of India Rules, and that the publication in the Gazette was caused in compliance with all its provisions.[16] An Officer passing an order should be presumed that he was authorised to pass the order until the contrary is shown.[17] Where a Municipal Council Constituted Committee and delegated some of its powers and functions to them, the delegation must be presumed to be validly made.[18] There is no presumption by which a delegation of power could be presumed.[19]

Where the powers of requisition are delegated to Collectors by the State and the Collectors are satisfied about the necessity for requisition, the State is presumed to be satisfied with regard to such requisition.[20] The presumption is that the public purpose of the Eviction Act for which the person is sought to be evicted from the public land was duly specified in the notice in compliance with the requirement of the Act.[21] Notification under Section 4 of the Land Acquisition Act is an official Act. Unless contrary is proved, it may be presumed to have been properly done.[22] Where land was acquired by the Government for a company, it may be presumed that land was acquired for purpose of business of the company.[23] Persons mentioned in notice under Section 9(3) of Land Acquisition Act must be presumed to be the only persons interested.[24] It may be presumed that the consent of Government under Section 40 of Land Acquisition Act has been granted.[25]

The presumption that the facts stated in a Government notification are correct is not an absolute presumption and may be rebutted by proper evidence.[26] Presumption as to the correctness of public purpose notified by the Government, is rebuttable and the court can examine the purpose.[27]

Cases.—Where the investigating team conducted search and seizure within the limits of another police station without informing the concerned police station to avoid delay and subsequently, the investigating officer wrote two letters regarding it to the concerned police station, it could be presumed that the official acts were performed regularly.[28] Where the Returning Officer had called the candidate and the proposer to remain present at the time of scrutiny of the nomination form but they did not turn up when their names were called on microphone and therefore after examining the forms by himself he rejected his nomination paper because of wrong electoral roll number mentioned therein, presumption arises that the official acts were done in accordance with rules and procedure.[29] Where the application of a candidate for admission was duly processed and scruitized through sub-committee which recommended her admission on being fully satisfied about eligibility, there arose the presumption as to performance of official act. Further, after persuance of the course for one year, withholding of her examination result for the verification of eligibility for admission was held to be illegal, especially when she took no undue advantage by deception or subterfuge.[30] Where notices for default of payment of debt under the State Financial Corporation Act were signed by the Branch Manager of the Corporation and not the Manager who was empowered under the Act, it was held to be proper as the Branch Manager had acted with properly delegated authority.[31] Where the cancellation of the mining lease on the ground of the report of the enquiry by the Government that the mining area fell within the forest area was challenged by the petitioner who did not place the report on the Court record, presumption as to correctness and regularity of official acts in submitting the report could be drawn.[32] Where delivery of the allotted land under the Punjab Security of Land Tenures Act, 1953 was the official act of the revenue authorities a presumption has to be raised that all the antecedent formalities were duly complied with.[33] Merely because the file containing the community-cum-residence certificate issued earlier to the petitioner was destroyed, the genuineness and correctness of the certificate could not be doubted unless there were other circumstances to rebut the presumption as to official acts.[34]

16. REGISTERING OFFICER

Facts recorded by the Registrar on the document could be presumed to be correct.[35] It may be presumed that a document is validly presented to the Registrar who proceeded to register the same.[36] A certified copy of a registered document can be accepted as correct copy under Section 114(e).[37] When a document contains a number and page of the register in which it is copied, a presumption can be raised that the certified copy and the endorsement must have been copied from the Register Book.[38]

A presumption could be drawn that the Registrar has discharged his official duties in accordance with law and certificate of registration also under certain circumstances be taken as evidence of execution. But if the executant herself comes before the Court and denies the execution of the document and if there are other circumstances supporting such denial, the presumption stands rebutted and the plaintiff is expected to produce better evidence.[39] Where the procedure laid down by law is not followed, validity of registration cannot be presumed in favour of the party.[40] That a document is registered does not raise a presumption that the Registrar must have read it out to the execution.[41]

17. NOTARY PUBLIC

There is presumption that a notary public must have satisfied himself in discharge of his official duties that the person executing the power of attorney is the proper person. Fact that the notary does not say so in his endorsement is not material.[42] Where an illiterate lady executed a document by affixing her thumb impression before a notary and there was no endorsement by the notary to the effect that the contents of the document were explained to her and the notary was not examined as a witness, no presumption under Section 114 can be raised regarding the execution of the document.[43]

Where an affidavit was not sworn in India, but before an Oaths Commissioner in Pakistan, presumption of regularity of official act would not apply.[44]

18. SANCTION ORDERS

When a letter intimating that sanction had been granted, is received, presumption would arise that sanction had in fact been accorded and that official act of granting sanction was regularly performed.[45] Where the sanction of a complaint by a Police Inspector is addressed to the I.G. of Police and there was nothing on record to show the Inspector was duly authorised, presumption that Inspector's action was not unauthorised can be drawn.[46]

19. REGISTERED POSTAL ARTICLES, LETTERS ETC.

Existence of acknowledgments in respect of registered articles in post office would raise a presumption that those articles were delivered to the addressee. Presumption may be rebutted by vidence of addressees that articles were in fact not received by them[47] but bare denial of his signature n the acknowledgement would not be sufficient to rebutt the presumption.[48] Where the postal cover is orrectly addressed and sent by registered post, the presumption with regard to service would arise under oth the provisions of Section 114 of the Evidence Act and Section 27 of the General Clauses Act. The vidence of actual tender and refusal to accept delivery is not necessary to bring about the resumption.[49] Where the notice returned with endorsement that the addressee was out of station, the otice would be deemed to be duly served.[50] Where a notice is sent by registered post, presumption will rise in favour of the sender.[51] Where the endorsement by the postman on the registered cover indicated hat he had gone to the address of the addressee several times but it was not clear whether he was present n the house or avoided to take delivery, his absence from the house cannot lead to the presumption of elivery. No steps were taken to send the notice by registered post again.[52] Where the registered notice ent by the landlord to the tenant was received back with endorsement "not claimed", it could not be eated to be one of refusal. The tenant denied the receipt of the notice on oath and the landlord produced o evidence to the contrary. No presumption of service of notice could be drawn.[53]

Ordinarily a statement of the addressee on oath that the postal cover, said to have been refused by im, was never tendered to him would be sufficient to discharge the presumption of service and shift the nus on the other side to establish by evidence that the service had been duly effected[54] but not the mere enial.[55]

20. ENTRIES IN RECORD OF RIGHTS, REVENUE RECORDS

Entries in record of rights can be presumed to be correct until presumption is rebutted[56] and if they emained unchallenged for a period of sixty years inspite of alienation of some of the property, the nchoate right became absolute as full ownership.[57]

The entries in the revenue records are generally to be accepted at their face value and courts should ot embark upon into their correctness. But the presumptiosn of correctness can apply only to genuine, ot forged or fraudulent entries. The distinction may be fine but it is real. One cannot challenge the orrectness of what the entry states, but the entry is open to attack that it was made fraudulently and urriptiously.[58]

Presumption arising from several entries in revenue records of large number of years in respect of ownership and possession of land with a certain person is not rebutted by mere stray entries in favour of others when evidence is of uncertain character and inadequate.[59] The presumption of correctness is confined only to the possession of the party on the date of record and does not confer any title on such party[60] but the entries in the remarks column have no presumptive value as to the rights/possession.[61]

Where the decision given by the trial court and the lower appellate court long before the publication of record of rights, was in conflict with the entries in the record of rights, the presumption as to correctness of the entries in the record of rights does not prevail.[62]

An entry in the Record of Rights stands on a different footing than other sort of entries in other village papers or mutation papers and the law does not attach so much sanctity to them as it does to the entry in the Record of Rights, which is presumed to be correct.[63]

The presumption regarding the correctness of entries in record of rights attaches also to non-agricultural lands.[64]

Where there is a conflict between the old record of rights and the recent one, the presumption is that the recent record is correct unless it is proved by evidence to be incorrect.[65]

Entry in Khasra is not conclusive proof of any right. There must be cogent evidence and the rights of parties cannot be determined on mere surmises and conjectures.[66] Khasra entries have only presumptive value[67] and so are the entries in nazul register but the presumption of their correctness is rebuttable.[68]

The truth of relationship may be presumed from the entries made in settlement pedigree tables.[69]

All formalities in respect of mutations must be presumed to have been complied with. No proof of such compliance is necessary. It is for the other party to rebut the presumption.[70] Entries in mutation registers do not confer any title. Mutation is not evidence of title.[71] Mutation of property does not create or extinguish title nor it has presumptive value of title.[72] Where mutation was done in compliance to the orders of the Sub-Divisional Officer, without placing and proving the said order, the said mutation entry could not be relied upon.[73]

Jamabandhi has no presumptive value as record of rights.[74] Entries in the Municipal Jamabandhis cannot prove title[75] but preparation of phaisal patti by the Tehsildar, being his official act, presumption would attach to it under Section 114(e) of the same having been regularly performed.[76]

Entries in the annual village papers under Sections 45 and 50 of the Madhya Bharat Land Revenue and Tenancy Act, 1950 create presumption albeit rebuttable in favour of a person whose name is recorded.[77]

21. ANALYST'S REPORT

A report signed by a Public Analyst under the Prevention of Food Adulteration Act, 1954, without any other proof, is admissible in evidence under this clause.[78]

Rules 7 and 18 under Prevention of Food Adulteration Act, 1954 are mandatory. Presumption under Section 114(e) of Evidence Act, 1872 in regard to regularity of procedure followed by public analyst may be raised when there is proof that the food inspector had discharged his functions according to rules.[79]

Food Analyst's report says that he received the sample and the specimen of seal separately. It is to be presumed that he received them in the manner stated in the report.[80] The public analyst's report stating that the sample was properly sealed is not conclusive. Section 114 cannot be invoked.[81] Clean and dry bottles and others containers are to be used for drawing and storing samples, under Rule 14, Prevention of Food Adulteration Rules. There was no evidence by the prosecution to show that the rules were complied with. However, it was held that the court may presume compliance under Section 114.[82]

Where there was delay in compiling the report on the analysis of a sample, presumption that analysis of the sample was also delayed cannot be drawn.[83]

22. NOTICE REQUIRED UNDER AN ACT

Where under an Act certain things are required to be done before any liability attaches to any person in respect of any right or obligation, it is for the person who alleges that libability, incurred to prove that the things prescribed in the Act, have been actually done. No presumption can be made in favour of the things prescribed by the Act having been done. If, for example, publication of a notice was essential under an Act in order to bind a person, such publication must be distinctly proved.[84] But the Privy Council has held that in the absence of evidence to the contrary it has to be presumed that the procedure laid down in a statute was duly followed and that proper statutory notice was given.[85] Where a warrant contains a preamble that the requirement of a section of an Act has been fulfilled, a presumption arises under this illustration that the officer issuing the warrant has performed his duty correctly.[86] Where the publication of notification regarding land acquisition proceedings was made locally, it could be presumed to be have been made as per a requirement of the Act unless proved otherwise.[87] The endorsement by the peon that he affixed the copy of notification at a conspicuous place in the locality, is sufficient to raise the presumption under Section 114(e). It need not be proved beyond shadow of doubt.[88]

The Calcutta High Court has held that the Privy Council has virtually overruled the decisions which laid down that it is not sufficient for the purpose of proving service of notice to rely on the presumption arising out of this section.[89]

23. REGULAR ENQUIRY

Where the order refusing the grant of Ryotwari patta was passed after conducting a regular inquiry under the Rules, presumption of the official acts being correctly done arose.[90]

24. VALID TITLE

Where the tenant had been in long possession, presumption of valid title and compeletion of all formalities preceding the allotment was raised.[91]

25. COMMON COURSE OF BUSINESS [ILLUSTRATION (f)]

This illustration leaves it to the discretion of the court to presume that a common course of business has been followed; but the court is not bound to presume it.[92]

In commercial transactions the presumption is that the usual course of business was followed by the parties thereto. Where the defendent does not prove any exceptional circumstances to conclude that regular course of practice was not followed in his case, a bare denial by him cannot be believed so as to rebut the presumption under Section 114(f).[93] When a notice issued by an officer of the Company purports to have been issued by order of the Board of Directors, the presumption is that it was issued pursuant to such an order in the common course of business.[94] The entry of the despatch number in a despatch register should ordinarily be presumed to be correct in the absence of any evidence to the contrary.[95] The practice followed by a peon was to despatch letters on the day he received it or on the next day, or else to return it at the office. There was an entry in the peon's book showing that the letter was received by the defendant but there was no date of receipt of the letter. It was held that the court could draw conclusion that the letter was received by the defendant either on the date when the letter was despatched or on the next day.[96] Where it is shown that the railway administration had sent to the booking station intimation of the arrival of goods, it may be presumed that the booking station received the intimation.[97] In a case of loss of goods in transit, the railway failed to produce 'outward tally book' and seal labels when required, an adverse inference could be drawn against it.[98] Though the place to which goods were to be booked was not stated in the agreement, but it implied that an understanding must have been to book the goods to the place where the plaintiff carried on his business in the absence of any other place agreed to.[99] In the usual course of business of the insurance company, marine premium debit was issued. A copy thereof was attached to copy of policy kept in the office. In such a case, the court is entitled to rely on presumption afforded by Section 114(f), that the practice of insurance company of attaching such a note to the policy had been followed in a particular case and proof of preparation of original premium note is not required.[1] Entries in the regularly maintained register of a nationalised company have been held to be perfectly reliable.[2]

A cheque of a customer was honoured beyond his balance without any agreement as to overdraft. It was presumed to be a loan[3]

Where two sets of account were seized, the court refused to draw the presumption that accounts showing less turn-over were correct.[4] Where the rate of rent specifically mentioned in the rent note was neither denied nor disputed by the tenant, fixation of standard rent as per rent note was held to be proper and the entries in the account books showing lesser rent were immaterial.[5] In a recovery proceeding of unpaid sale consideration by the Official Liquidator against the purchaser of goods, there was no evidence to prove the receipt of goods by the purchaser, no liability could be fastened on the purchaser merely on the basis of entries in the account books of the company, though regularly kept, more so when the account books were beset with many clerical/arithmetical errors.[6]

Persons dealing with statutory bodies are presumed to have notice of provisions of the Act governing such corporations.[7] Where there is no evidence to show that reserves were non-existent or they were being utilised for a purpose other than the business of company, presumption is that they were being utilized as working capital of the company.[8] Where the counsel of the accused puts defametory questions to the complainant, the court has to start with the presumption that the questions were put on the instructions of the client.[9] Reply to a plaintiff's notice received from the defendant by post, though typed and unsigned, may be presumed to be on behalf of the defendant.[10]

The Privy Council held: "The personal tender or delivery may take place anywhere; the vicarious tender or delivery must take place at the residence of the person intended to be bound by the notice. In the case of joint tenants, each is intended to be bound and it has long ago been decided that service of a notice to quit upon a joint tenant is prima facie evidence that it has reached the other joint tenants."[11]

Where the notice of termination of tenancy was issued by the lawyer on behalf of the plaintiff/landlady which was proved by her father/agent, it would be presumed that the father was authorised to instruct the lawyer to give notice and onus to disprove it would lie on the defendant /tenant.[12]

26. POSTAL SERVICE

If a letter is put into a post office, that is prima facie proof, until the contrary appears, that the party to whom it is addressed received it in due course.[13] Post marks on letters are prima facie evidence that the letters were in the post at the time and palce therein specified... if a letter properly directed, is proved to have been either put into the post office or delivered to the postman, it is presumed, from the known course of business in that department of public service, that it reached the destination at the regular time, and was received by the person to whom it was addressed.[14]

The presumption under Section 114 stands rebutted when the addressee states on oath that such a letter was not tendered to him or refused by him.[15]

See the undermentioned cases where it was held that a mere denial of receipt of notice served by post will not be sufficient to rebut the presumption arising under Section 114 of the Evidence Act.[16]

A notice under Order 37, C.P.C. sent through registered post was received by some one on behalf of the defendant. It could be presumed that it was delivered to the defendant.[17] The presumption is stronger when the letter is sent by registered post and the acknowledgement is signed by someone at the other end[18] and it would not be necessary to examine the postman simply because the receipt of the notice was denied by the addressee/trustee[19] and the Court need not wait for service by ordinary process.[20] The existence of acknowledgements in respect of letters given in the post office would raise a presumption that those articles were delivered to the addressee.[21] Where a notice is required to be served by post under any Central or State Government and a notice is dispatched by a registered post an obligatory presumption of due service would arise.[22] Where the post cover has been correctly addressed and has been sent by registered post, the presumption with regard to service would arise under both provisions of Section 114 of the Evidence Act and Section 27 of the General Clauses Act.[23] Where there is an endorsement of postman that a letter sent by registered post was refused, there is presumption of service of the letter of notice. Bare statement of the addressee on oath denying tender and refusal to accept, is not sufficient to rebut the presumption.[24] Where a notice sent by registered post was returned with endrosements 'not claimed' and 'mis-sent' made by postal peon who visited the premises twice it should be taken considering the first endorsement i.e. "not claimed" that the letter was refused giving rise to the presumption of due service.[25] The effect of sending a letter to the post office will in general, be regarded as presumptively proved, if the letter be shown to have been handed to or left with the person whose duty it was in the ordinary course of business to carry it to the post office.[26] Where a draft was purchased and sent by post to the payee who was residing at a distence of 38 miles, presumption would be that there was implied request to send it by post and the act of posting itself would amount to delivey of draft.[27] From the invitation cards, bearing the postal stamps of the place of posting and also that of the place of destination, an inference could be drawn that in the normal course they were posted and received by the addressee.[28] Where a post card is received through the Post Office, presumption that it was written by the purported sender cannot be drawn. The only presumption that can be drawn is that it reached the addressee in an ordinary course.[29]

However it has been held that the effect to be given to the word "refused" on a registered cover as proof of the tender of the packet to the addressee is one of fact and will depend upon the circumstances of each case.[30]

The presumption stood rebutted when the addressee showed that the whole family was out of station at the material time on a mooran ceremony.[31] Where a notice was sent by a registered post was returned as "refused", the court is to be careful in drawing any presumption because it is not unusual for the postman to make such endrosements without proper care and sometimes deliberately.[32] In the absence of proof to show that the sender gave correct particulars of the addressee on the notices and on the forms of acknowledgement, and the defendant had categorically denied receipt of any notice and also to have signed the acknowledgement, the presumption under Section 114 of the Evidence Act, and Section 27 of the General Clauses Act, cannot arise and the onus to prove service of notice would be on the sender.[33]

Postal receipt in proof of despatch of registered notice along with a copy of notice bearing correct address, would arise a presumption, in the absence of return of the notice by the Dead Letter Office, that the notice reached the destination. Insufficient address of the addressee on the postal receipt does not rebut the presumption.[34] Where the demand notice under the Negotiable Instruments Acts was sent under registered post acknowledgement due but neither postal cover nor the acknowledge-ment was returned, it could be presumed that the addressee had received the notice.[35]

Where notice for recovery of maintenance was sent to the husband by Registered Post and not as contemplated under Section 125(3), Cr.P.C., the same being illegal, the question of any inference about its receipt to be drawn does not arise.[36]

Presumption of corresponedence through post arises only when it is proved by calling the writer or one who was conversant with his writing or atleast the person who posted it. Similarly, refusal by an addressee can be presumed when the endorsement to that effect by the postal peon is proved by calling him or some one to prove his handwriting.[37] If the notice is addressed to joint lessees and it is tendered and refused by one of them, constructive knowledge to other lessees may be presumed.[38] Where a parcel sent by V.P.P. was delivered to the addressee but money was not recovered, from him, the person sending the parcel is entitled to presumtion under Section 114 that the common course of business has been followed and that parcel was duly delivered and payment was received by post office.[39]

The presumption created by refusal to take a letter is not be littled by the inability of the postman to identify the addressee after a gap of time.[40]

Presumption is not merely as to delivery but also as to knowledge of contents.[41]

A "certificate of posting" not only raised the presumption that the letter was duly posted but also the presumption that the letter was received by the addressee.[42] The law does not raise an unrebuttable presumption that the postal article sent under certificate of posting was received by the addressee/ petitioner in due course.[43] Where summons was published in the newspaper and a copy of the said newspaper was sent to the party on his address under certificate of posting and its delivery was not rebutted, there arose presumption regarding service of summons.[44] However it was held that a certificate of posting raises a presumption that the letter has been posted but no presumption as to its receipt by the addressee can be drawn.[45] A certificate of posting raises a presumption that a letter was posted as described in the certificate, but the presumption does not go to the extent of covering the contents of the letter.[46] Presumption under Section 114 available for service under certificate of posting should not be given effect to where a notice sent by registered post is returned with the endorsement "Left".[47] A certificate of posting is easy to procure and does not inspire confidence.[48]

It may be presumed that an M.O. was tendered to the addressee living in the same town within about a week or ten days from the date of remittance.[49] There is a presumption that the postal authorities returned the amount sent by money order to the sender if it could not be delivered to the payee.[50] Where a money order is sent by a tenant within the statutory period and the landlord refuses to receive it, there is sufficient tender and the tenant must be deemed to have fulfilled his part of duty. It is not necessary to examine the postman to prove refusal.[51] In the absence of proof that mony order is correctly addressed, presumption that money order must have reached the addressee cannot be drawn.[52]

An order of Government Communicated by telegram, neither expressed in the name of the Governor nor authenticated by proper authority, must be presumed to have been validily posted when there is clear avertment of the existence of such an order.[53]

Mere entries in the Despatch register are not sufficient to raise the presumption of due service on the addressee in the absence of an affidavit or other evidence to show that the copies were handed over to or left with the person whose duty it was in the ordinary course of business to carry them to the post office.[54]

27. WITHHOLDING EVIDENCE [ILLUSTRATION (g)]

This illustration deals with the presumption arising from withholding evidence. The conduct of the person withholding the evidence may be attributed to a supposed consciousness that the evidence, if produced, would operate against him.[55]

It is not a sound practice for those desiring to rely on a certain state of facts to withhold from the court the best evidence which is in their possession which would throw light upon the issues in controversy and to rely upon the abstract doctrine of onus of proof.[56]

BEST ON EVIDENCE, Section 411, states that this rule of presumption under illus. (g) is based on the principle that no one shall be allowed to take advantage of his own wrong. The rule contains the well known maxim "Omnia praesumnutur contra spoliation". Where a person withholds wrongfully evidence, every presumption to his disadvantage, consistent with the facts admitted or proved, has to be adopted.

"The non-production of evidence that would naturally have been produced by an honest and, therefore, fearless claimant permits the inference that its tenor is unfavourable to the party's cause". (WIGMORE Section 285).

In case of withholding best evindence adverse inference can be drawn[57] but no adverse inference can be drawn for non-production of a notification published in the Official Gazette which is a public document and has the effect of law.[58]

The presumption of adverse inference cannot displace the contrary inference supported by adequate evidence.[59]

Before drawing the adverse inference, the court must be satisfied about the existence of the relevant evidence in the possession of the party which could be produced.[60]

Where neither party produces any evidence, even though any of them can produce it, if available, absence of evidence does not help either party.[61]

Where available evidence is not produced, it is not obligatory but optional to draw a presumption under Section 114(g) of the Evidence Act. It is one of fact, depending upon the whole set of facts.[62] The original F.I.R., alleged to have been sent to the Magistrate, was not produced and its alleged carbon copy bore neither the initials of the Magistrate nor the seal of the Court was affixed on it. Neither its date of receipt nor any serial number of tapal receipt register was given. Adverse inference could be drawn that the F.I.R. was not received by the Magistrate.[63] Where in an accidental claim petition, the true relationship between the truck-owner and the appellant company which had entered into a hire-purchase agreement with the truck-owner as a security for an alleged loan granted by the appellant to the truck-owner, had been suppressed by withholding from the Court the real documents executed between them, the Courts below were held justified in drawing an adverse inference against the appellant and fastening joint liability on it.[64] Where a witness stated that he had received letters threatening the deceased and that the same are with the police, a failure to produce them created an adverse presumption.[65]

Withholding best evidence available to a party and relying upon the abstract doctrine of onus of proof may result in drawing adverse inference against that party.[66] Whether or not an adverse inference from the non-production of the best evidence by a person on whom the burden of proving a fact lies, should be drawn, is not an inflexible rule but is dependent upon the circumstances of each individual case.[67] The court may draw an adverse inference from the failure of a party to produce the best evidence in its possession to prove a fact when the initial burden in regard to the proof of which has been discharged by the other party.[68] Where the Collector or the State Govt. failed to produce affidavits or any material record showing requirement of the land for public purpose despite directions of the Court, it was held that an adverse inference of non-application of mind on the part of the authorities while requisitioning the land, could be drawn.[69] Where in a motor accident the insurer sought to avoid liability on the ground that the insured was a minor which fact was not allegedly suppressed from the insurer when the policy was issued and the insurer accepted the premium, adverse inference would be drawn against the insurer for non-production of the form of proposal of the policy[70] but where the defendant made no claim that any lease deed had been executed, no adverse inference could be drawn against the plaintiff claiming adverse possession for non-production of non-existing lease deed.[71]

The parties to a suit should bring before the court their best evidence, and when it is not produced the court is justified in concluding that it would, if brought into court,[72] not support the case of the party omitting to produce it.

Where a person is charged under the provisions of Food Adulteration Act, no adverse inference can be drawn against the accused for refusing to produce the bottle containing the sample given to him.[73]

In an admission test to medical colleges, a candidate was given a wrong type of answer-book which was replaced by a correct one after sometime. The candidate could attempt only 170 questions out of 200 and secured 94.555% marks and prayed that her answer-book should be assessed on the basis of only 170 questions. The examination authorities alleged that right type of answer-book was supplied to her without any loss of time. The candidate requested that her first answer book should be produced to assess the loss of time which the authorities failed to do. An adverse inference was drawn against them that if the same was produced, that would have substantiated her version.[74] Where surveillance and domicilliary visits by the police under the Police Regulations has to be discontinued unless some special reason is recorded by the S.P. but the same continued for twelve years without recording reasons and no counter-affidavit was filed by the police authorities, presumption could be drawn in favour of the petitioners and against the police authorities that there was nothing before the police to justify the surveillance.[75] Where the accused failed to get his injuries sustained in the incident examined for three days and the prosecution failed to produce injury report of the accused, it was held that inference that the injuries of the accused were manufactured, could not be reached.[76] In a situation where the material produced by the prosecution was itself sufficient to prove the guilt of the accused, Section 114(g) is of no assistance to him.[77] Adverse inference can be drawn from the non-production of the F.I.R. and the general diary by the police.[78] But the Apex Court has held that production of daily diary of the police station is not a matter of course in every prosecution case, hence no adverse inference can be drawn on its non-production.[79]

Withholding as distinguished from failure:

An adverse inference can be drawn against a party if there is withholding of evidence and not merely on account of the failure of the party to obtain evidence.[80]

It is an established principle of law that it is for the suitor to decide which would be the best evidence to prove his case. For failure to produce a piece of evidence an adverse inference should not be drawn against the party who has chosen not to file it, unless the other side had called for that evidence.[81] Also where failure to produce substantive piece of evidence has not gone to the root of the prosecution case, no adverse inference can be drawn.[82]

Failure to examine a material witness by the defence must lead to the inference that the witness was deliberately withheld as he was not likely to support the defence.[83]

Where the prosecution in a prohibition case failed to take samples and have them sent to chemical Analyst for his opinion, the presumption is that the prosecution withheld evidence as it was not likely to support their case.[84]

No adverse inference can be drawn against a party from the circumstances that it has not examined all the witnesses mentioned by it.[85]

28. WITHHOLDING MATERIAL WITNESSES

A party's deliberate avoidance or feeling shy of giving evidence in the witness box, raises a presumption against his contention and the court would be justified in drawing an adverse inference against him.[86] Where it was sought that certain sale-deeds be declared to have been obtained by exercising undue influence and co-ercion on the executant and the plaintiff alleged that one of the purchasers had no means to pay the consideration, the said purchaser was not examined to seek explanation adverse inference should be drawn against the said purchaser that had she been examined, it would have gone against her.[87] Adverse inference may be drawn against the party under Section 114 of the Evidence Act, for failure on its part to call material witnesses.[88] Where a party fails to call as his witness the principal person involved in the transaction who is in a position to give a first-hand account of the matters of controversy and throw light on them and who can rebutt all allegations of the other side, it is legitimate to draw adverse inference against the party who was not produced such principal witness.[89] Where besides other evidence, there was on record a receipt book of subscription from public for the construction of the temple in question and the person concerned with it who was one of the applicants claimed that the temple was a private one, avoided to give evidence, an adverse inference was drawn against him to hold that the temple was private.[1] In an election petition, it was alleged that voters were threatened with divine displeasure in a speech at a certain meeting. The petitioner failed to produce the material witness and the notes made by him at the meeting. It was held that adverse inference may be drawn the petitioner.[2] During an election a leaflet against a candidate was printed by a witness who stated that he received a letter from the returned candiate 'T' through one 'R'. It was held that from the ommission by 'T' to examine 'R' who was his election agent to contradict the witness, it could be presumed that 'R' was not prepared to contradict the statement of the witness.[3] In an election petition it was alleged that the agent of the returned candidate distributed hand bills containing serious allegations against the petitioner. It was held presumption can be drawn against the petitioner when he failed to produce the original matter or the printer.[4] In a suit for recovering damages against the owners of a vessel, there was allegation by the plaintiff that the owners of the vessel and the charterers of another vessel were one and the same entity and the vessel was owned by named individual. The defendant owners produced no document to disclose shareholding pattern of either the owner or the shareholding of the majority shareholder which was considered to be within the special knowledge of the owners and they were under obligation under Section 106 to disclose the name of the majority shareholder which they failed to do. The Court would be constrained to assume adversely to the interest of the owners under Section 114(g).[5] Where there was a collision between a bus and a car and it was contended by the bus owner that the car driver was rash and negligent, it was held that from the non-examination of bus driver without any explanation, adverse inference can be drawn against the bus owner.[6] In a claim for damages under the Motor Vehicles Act for causing injuries to the claimant on account of negligence in driving, the best evidence would be that of the driver. Non-examination of the driver would lead to a presumption that the claimants sustained injuries on account of negligent driving.[7] The presumption laid down in this illustration was held to apply to the case of counsel engaged in a suit who should not have been, under the circumstances, the counsel but should have been called as a witness.[8]

No adverse presumption need be drawn against the defendant who fails to depose in a suit filed against him when there is other evidence both documentary and oral.[9] The question of drawing adverse inference would arise only when there is no other evidence on record on the point in issue.[10] Where the evidence adduced by the prosecution was adequate to prove the charge, non-examination of another person who was on the scene of occurrence would not make such evidence unreliable.[11]

In proceedings for eviction of tenant, an adverse inference against the landlord for not examining himself, is not justified when his attorney knowing all the facts of the case deposed.[12] Where there were no inherent improbabilities in the evidence of witness examined by the plaintiff, non-examination of the plaintiff may not lead to any adverse inference against him.[13] Adverse inference under Section 114 cannot be drawn for mere non-examination of the plaintiff when other material witnesses are produced.[14] Non-examination of a certain witness by one of the contesting parties does not amount to withholding of evidence, entitling the Court to draw an adverse inference against that party. The complainant party can examine such witness.[15] In a case filed by the husband against the wife for judicial separation of the ground of desertion by the wife, the case of the wife was that she left the house with the consent or knowledge of her husband's parents. It was held when the court rejects the evidence of the respondent in support of her plea, it is not incumbent on the petitioner to adduce negative evidence of his mother to deny the plea of the respondent rejected by the court. No adverse presumption may be drawn against the petitioner.[16] Where, in an election petition, the successful candidate does not examine a particular witness to controvert facts alleged by petitioners witnesses in their evidence, the court cannot draw in adverse inference against the successful candidate since no onus is cast upon him to prove the particular facts.[17] Where in an application for staying the suit, the defendant expressed in the application his willingness and readiness to get the arbitration agreement enforced but did not enter the witness-box, no adverse inference could be drawn against him.[18]

Where it was alleged that the victim was raped when her husband was sleeping near her, failure to examine the husband is fatal to the prosecution and an adverse inference could be drawn[19] but where there was no evidence to show that anyone of the nearby house had witnessed the incident, no adverse inference could be drawn for non-examination of any such witness.[20]

The correct law as to the proper effect of the non-production of a witness cannot be decided in the abstract. It is a question of fact to be determined on a consideration of the circumstances of the individual case, in which inter alia the following factors should receive due consideration:

(i) Whether the witness is in a position to give relevant and material evidence.

(ii) Whether the witness is within easy reach of the prosecution or not, or whether there are circumstances justifying the withholding of a witness viz., the witness is likely to be hostile to the prosecution.

(iii) The nature and intensity of the controversy raised by the defence on a particular issue on which the witness is expected to give evidence and.

(iv) Persuasiveness of the evidence which is on the record.[21]

29. MATERIAL WITNESSES (CRIMINAL)

In a criminal case failure to give evidence of relevant facts leads to the presumption that evidence which could be produced and is not produced would, if produced, be unfavourable to the person who withholds it.[22]

If the prosecution fails to examine material witnesses an adverse inference against the prosecution can be raised.[23] Merely because a material witness was not examined by the prosecution, a Criminal Court is not to lean to draw the adverse inference that, if he was examined, he would have given a contrary version. The illustration (g) in Section 114 is only a permissible inference and not a necessary inference. Unless there are other circumstances also to facilitate the drawing of an adverse inference, it should not be a mechanical process to draw the adverse inference merely on the strength of non-examination of a witness, even if it is a material witness.[24]

The Supreme Court observed : "All the circumstances vouched by the eye-witnesses unerringly and irresistibly led to the conclusion that the two contusions and the head injury were received by the accused after he had stabbed the deceased; non-production of any other witness, loses its significance much less can it afford a ground for drawing an adverse inference against the prosecution".[25]

Where the prosecution chose to examine two out of five eye-witnesses who were interested and inimical to the accused and were not corroborated by other independent witnesses, it was held that the evidence of the two eye-witnesses has to be rejected.[26]

Failure to examine independent witnesses who were admittedly in the room next to which the accused was taken, and recovery of articles was made, makes the entire case of recovery unacceptable.[27] Where the prosecution examines only interested, though independent witnesses are available, adverse inference against the prosecution is justified[28] but not where the accused was suddenly apprehended from a thoroughfare without any pre-plan.[29] Where the prosecution dropped the independent witnesses after examining the injured witnesses, it could not be inferred that it was done with an oblique motive.[30] Where the statement of the independent witness recorded under Section 162, Cr.P.C. was found to be not against the prosecution, no adverse inference could be drawn by their non-examination.[31] Where independent persons of the locality were not willing to tell the police that they had seen the incident, veracity of the evidence of the witnesses examined as eye-witnesses could not be doubted merely on the ground of non-examination of independent witnesses.[32]

Prosecution has discretion as to what witnesses should be called. It is not necessary to call all the witnesses to spell out the same fact and the court will not interfere with that discretion unless it can be shown that prosecution is influenced by some oblique motive.[33]

When the prosecution examines witnesses from a distant locality and does not examine the only witness from the same locality where the search was made by the police, an adverse inference may be made against the prosecution.[34] Where the prosecution filed along with the chalan a list of witnesses and did not examine them, it was held, that the non-production of such witnesses raised a presumption that the evidence, if given by those witnesses, would be unfavourable to the prosecution.[35] Where the question was of minority, not examining the brother and father who were the most natural witnesses of age created an adverse presumption.[36] Where the prosecution fails to produce a certain witness who was examined in the previous trial for the same offence, a presumption that he would not have supported the prosecution had he been produced, can be raised.[37] Where the charge was based on the statement given by the accused to the inspecting officer and attested by two witnesses and the prosecution failed to produce the attesting witnesses, it was held that an adverse inference could be drawn from the fact of non-production of the attesting witnesses to the statement of the accused since they were both material witnesses.[38] Though the prosecution is not bound to call all available witnesses irrespective of considerations of number or reliability, witnesses essential to the unfolding of the narrative on which the prosecution is based must be called by the prosecution, whether in the result the effect of their testimony is for or against the case for the prosecution. Where the case against the accused was that he gave orders to the police to fire and the Deputy Commissioner of Police, who had accompanied the accused and had witnessed the occurrence, was not examined by the prosecution, it was held that the failure to examine him not only led to an adverse inference against the prosecution case but also cast serious reflection on the fairness of the trial.[39] If the prosecution does not examine independent witnesses but examines only partisan and interested witnesses adverse inference may be drawn against the prosecution.[40] Non-examination of material witness to prove the defence version in a criminal case is the strongest possible circumstance to discredit the defence version.[41] Failure on the part of the prosecution to explain injuries on the person of the accused can give rise to the following presumptions: 1. that the prosecution has suppressed information as to the nature of the occurrence; 2. that the witnesses who have denied those injuries are telling lies to the court; 3. that the defence of the accused that he committed the crime in self-defence becomes more plausible shifting the burden to the prosecution.[42] A maid-servant working in the verandah heard the cries of a married woman being pushed into the room and meeting her death there but she was not produced. This created a presumption against the prosecution.[43] Non-examination of the doctor who conducted the autopsy in a murder case by the prosecution is a drawback for the prosecution and may be fatal.[44]

In a Civil suit or a criminal case, it is not necessary that a party should examine all the possible witnesses. Where a party examines only a few witnesses and the court is inclined to draw an adverse inference from the non-examination of the remaining eye-witnesses, it is but equitable that it should be made clear to the party that other witnesses be also examined and in case of failure to do so, an adverse inference would be drawn.[45]

Non-production of a material witness would not introduce infirmity in the prosecution case where the prosecution case is based entirely on documentary evidence.[46] Non-examination of witnesses who were not eye-witnesses did not affect the prosecution case.[47] Where the prosecution did not examine the witnesses who came to the spot after the incident, it was held to be not fatal to the prosecution.[48] When some witnesses are not examined by the prosecution, a mere consideration that they might have thrown further light on the actual happenings would not justify the conclusion that the omission to examine them was with an oblique motive and would have gone to benefit the accused. Adverse inference may not be drawn in such cases.[49] To avoid proliferation of evidence the prosecution may drop the examination of certain witnesses and no adverse inference can be drawn from this.[50] Normally all the eye witnesses have to be examined. If selection is made fairly and honestly and not with a view to suppressing inconvenient witnesses from the witness-box, no adverse inference can be drawn against the prosecution.[51] Where a reasonable explanation was given by the prosecution for not examining material witnesses and where the defence did not make an application to the trial court or the High Court but made an application for the first time before the Supreme Court during the course of arguments, it was held that no adverse presumption can be drawn against the prosecution.[52] Where the explanation of the prosecution for non-examination of the injured witness that he was gained over by the accused was borne out by record, an adverse presumption under Section 114, illustration (g) could not be drawn against the prosecution.[53] Where the prosecution fails to examine a material witness, but offers to produce the witness for cross-examination and the counsel for the accused does not take advantage of cross-examining the witness so offered, no adverse inference can be drawn against the prosecution.[54] The probative value of other witnesses would not be affected by the non-examination of some witnesses who were known by the prosecution to have been won over by the accused.[55] No adverse presumption can be raised against the prosecution on non-examination of the injured witness who lodged the F.I.R. but was won over by the accused.[56] No adverse inference can be drawn against the prosecution, if it does not examine witnesses gained over by the accused.[57] When the prosecution after having summoned a witness and made him appear, gives up that witness on the ground that he has turned hostile or he has been won over by the accused, the question of raising a presumption under Section 114(g) does not arise.[58] Where the prosecution did not examine a particular witness on the ground that his testimony would be a duplication of another witness already produced, it was held that the non-production of another witness did not militate against the prosecution.[59] Where the prosecution does not produce a non-material witness, no adverse inference can be drawn against it.[60] Not producing a factional witness creates no presumption.[61] In case of failure to examine persons whose statements were recorded by the police, as witnesses, no adverse inference can be drawn.[62] In committal proceedings instituted on a police report, absolute discretion is given to the prosecution in the matter of production of witnesses of the actual commission of the offence as per the new provision under Section 207-A, Cr.P.C. The law empowers the Magistrate to take evidence of any one or more of the other witnesses for the prosecution, if he considers it necessary in the interest of justice. No inference adverse to the prosecution can be drawn from such non-production of all the identification witnesses before the Committing Magistrate.[63] No adverse inference can be drawn against the prosecution for not-examining the head-constable before whom the prosecutrix and the accused were first produced when the evidence of the prosecutrix, in a rape case was found to be true and was fully corroborated.[64] Where the testimonies of the two independent witnesses, the Magistrate and the doctor were found to be reliable, no adverse inference could be drawn and no prejudice could be said to have been caused to the accused by non-examination of the daughter of the deceased or due to infirmities in framing of the charges.[65] No adverse inference can be drawn against the prosecution for failure on its part to explain minor injuries on the person of the accused.[66]

The prosecution is not bound to call witnesses irrespective of consideration of number and reliability. It is only those witnesses who are essential to the unfolding of the prosecution story, that

30. WITHHOLDING OF DOCUMENTS (CIVIL)

(a) Party

LORD SHAW referred to: "a practice, grown up in Indian procedure of those in possession of important documents or information lying by, trusting to the abstract doctrine of the onus of proof, and failing accordingly to furnish to the courts the best material for its decision. With regard to third parties, this may be right enough; they have no responsibility for the conduct of the suit; but with regard to the parties to the suit, it is in their Lordships' opinion an inversion of sound practice for those desiring to rely upon a state of facts to withhold from the court the written evidence in their possession which would throw light upon the proposition".[68] But where it was held that where neither party produced any evidence though any of them could have produced it the absence of evidence was inconclusive.[69]

Where a party in possession of best evidence i.e., material document which would throw light on the issue in controversy withholds it, the court may draw an adverse inference against him notwithstanding that the fact that onus of proof does not lie on him.[70] Where a party failed to produce documents asked for by any Authority, the Authority would be entitled to draw inferences as it might think justified.[71] Where an assessee fails to put before the department of revenue, material in his exclusive possession, adverse inference can be drawn against the assessee.[72] Withholding of a document by the Government under the plea that it is a privileged document leads to adverse inference against the Government.[73] Where the defendant admits service of a notice but alleges that the notice was not valid and sufficient and does not produce the notice and fails to give any explanation for its non-production, it is proper and reasonable to infer that the notice was in the custody of the defendant and that if it had been produced, it would have shown that it was valid and sufficient.[74] Where in spite of the court's directions the defendant did not produce the documents and kept in the office which would throw light on the question of his negligence, it was held adverse inference that he was negligent, could be drawn.[75] The plaintiff, in order to prove misconduct and negligence of railway, may call upon the railway administration to produce evidence and if it does not produce it, the court may infer that, if evidence was produced, it would have gone against the defendant.[76] Where goods carried at railway risk are damaged, the burden is on the Railway Administration to place material before the court to show that as much care as was required was taken by them. Non-production of such material will justify raising an adverse inference against them.[77] When primary evidence is withheld by the Railway Administration, the court can draw adverse presumption against the administration.[78] Where the Railways failed to disclose to the consignor how the consignment was handled in transit, adverse inference can be drawn.[79] Where a stationary truck was damaged by a truck in motion, compensation was claimed from the owner of the truck in motion and its insurer, failure on the part of the insurer to produce the insurence policy gives rise to an adverse inference against the insurer.[80] An adverse presumption arose where a notification declared certain premises as shops without giving any opportunity to the owner. The relevant material justifying the notification was not produced in the court[81]. A worker claimed to have become permanent on account of continuous service. The Reserve Bank failed to produce any records. The worker's case was presumed to be true.[82] In a rent control case, the mere fact that the onus to prove the case is on the landlord, is immaterial where the appellant tenant has suppressed the land lord's notice, alleged to bear no signature, though in possession of the same. The tenant cannot be allowed to take advantage of abstract doctrine of the onus of proof. The court is justified in drawing presumption against the tenant in terms of Section 114(g).[83] Where a court directed the State Government to furnish information regarding a particular Government Scheme, adverse inference can be drawn for non-compliance with the direction.[84] Where despite directions of the Court the appellate-State failed to produce the merit list, an adverse inference was drawn that no merit list was prepared.[85] Where the respondent state failed to file counter-affidavit and produce records to substantiate its case despite Court direction, the appellant's case was accepted that he was entitled for promotion.[86] Where a party alleges that houses were purchased out of the sale-proceeds of land belonging to joint family and does not produce sale deed of land or extracts from land records to show existence of land, but offers oral evidence, adverse inference may be drawn for non-production of documents and oral evidence cannot be accepted.[87] Adverse inference can be drawn against the plaintiff alleging co-ownership rights in some portion of the land if he fails to produce the sale deed by him.[88] Where a witness for the plaintiff admitted that the plaintiff had got records of property of his private estate and all the properties were mentioned therein but he did produce the records, a presumption was raised that had the records been produced, they would not have supported the plaintiff's case.[89] A very strong presumption must be raised against a party who withholds a document which is the best evidence and abstains himself from appearing in the witness box.[90] Under the Punjab Gram Panchayat Act an adverse presumption could be drawn that the second enquiry was not competent and was liable to be quashed when the first enquiry was withheld by the authorities.[91]

Where a company claimed depreciation it was held mere production of auditor's certificate is not sufficient in the absence of the balance sheet and profit and loss account.[92]

It cannot be held that in order to raise the presumption under Section 114(g), it is necessary to follow the procedure of giving a notice for production of documents under O. XI, C.P.C. or summon documents under O. XVI, C.P.C. The only important condition is that the party should prove that the document is in existence and is in the possession or custody of the party against whom the adverse inference is sought to be drawn.[93] An adverse inference may be raised by the court against a party withholding evidence in his possession notwithstanding the fact that the party is not called upon expressly to make an affidavit of documents and inspection and production of documents is not demanded.[94]

No adverse inference can be drawn against the insurance company producing incomplete policy with endorsement not showing the extent of its liability as the insured had not pleaded its unlimited liability. Besides the insurer was not bound to produce policy[95] and also against the owner of a motor vehicle whose liability was to be determined for an accident, for not producing the permit of the vehicle which he was never asked to produce.[96]

(b) Withholding Account Books

Non-production of account books which are relevant for determination of the issues in the case may give rise to an adverse inference against the party who fails to produce them.[97] An adverse inference can be drawn against a party for non-production of account books if the other side had asked the court to order that party to produce accounts and the party had failed to produce them.[98] Adverse inference can be drawn against the party for not producing relevant account books, even if they were not summoned by the opposite party.[99] Where the writ of certiorari issued by the High Court directing the Government of India to produce the records of accounts in the Court was not complied with, adverse inference could be drawn against the Government for keeping the best evidence away from the Court of law and the same was held to be against the principles of public justice.[1] Presumption as to consideration under a pronote under Section 118(a) Negotiable Instruments Act can be rebutted by evidence which need not necessarily be by direct evidence. In the case of a professional money lender adverse inference can be drawn if he suppressed his account books and can be held that in his case that he advanced money to the dependent was not true.[2]

In a suit for recovery of amount due on the basis of adjustment, the defendant was in possession of account books from which the balance could be ascertained. It is the duty of the defendant to produced the account books before the court. He cannot rely upon the abstract doctrine of onus of proof that it was not his duty to produce them unless he was called upon to do so.[3]

31. WITHHOLDING OF DOCUMENTS AND ACCOUNT BOOKS—WHEN PRESUMPTION CAN NOT BE DRAWN

(a) Documents

Where party fails to produce document in his possession adverse inference can be drawn and non-production would not affect the appreciation of other documents.[4]

Where there is no evidence on record to show that a document having an important bearing on a dispute is with the party or within his power and that it is withheld from the Court, the court would refuse to raise an adverse inference against that party.[5]

It is not incumbent on a party to produce documents, which, according to him, have no bearing on the case. It is for the other party to apply for inspection of documents which appear to him to be relevant and proper. If he fails to do so, neither he nor the court is entitled to draw any presumption regarding the contents of the documents.[6]

Court will not draw a presumption under Section 114(g) against a person from his non-production of a document, where it is not shown that he had withheld this evidence or had any concern in doing away or suppressing the evidence.[7] Where a party produced only some of the documents in his possession and did not produce some and so, if the opposite party did not ask or question about the documents which were not produced, then no adverse inference can be drawn against the party who did not produce some of the documents. But the court can take into consideration in weighing the evidence from the established facts that the documents which were not produced might have favoured the case of the opposite party.[8] When the party is not called upon to produce a document, adverse inference cannot be drawn from the mere non-production unless there is deliberate supression of the document.[9] Where the defendant did produce a document in the trial court, though at a later stage, and the plaintiff objected to its reception and the court shut it out, no adverse inference can be drawn against the dedendant from the fact that the document was not produced by him in time.[10] In a suit for specific performance the intending purchaser plaintiff stated that he had deposited in a bank a sum more than the sale consideration, thereby giving the defendant to understand that he was willing and ready to purchase the property, as per the terms of the agreement for sale. The defendant did not enquire about the name of the bank where the deposit was made. Neither he nor the court asked the plaintiff to produce the pass-book. In those circumstances adverse cannot be drawn against the plaintiff for non-production of the pass-book.[11] Presumption that a document is antedated cannot be raised against the person producing it, on the ground of failure of petition writer to produce the register required to be maintained by him to show the date on which the document was written. It can only affect the value of petition-writer's evidence.[12] When burden of proving that the properties of the temple are held by the reigning mahant on trust for public purposes is on the Board of Religious Trust, the court cannot draw an adverse inference for failure of Mahant to produce the document where under the properties had been gifted to the founding Mahant.[13] No adverse inference can be drawn against a person from non-production by him of relevant documents when no burden of proof lies on him to prove a certain fact.[14] No presumption can be drawn in the case of non-production of a document by a rustic who is ignorant of the importance of the document.[15] When a relevant document or any other evidence (birth and death register) is available to both parties but none of them produces it, no adverse inference can be drawn from the non-production against plaintiff.[16]

(b) Account Books

A pre-requisite to the drawing of an adverse inference from the non-production of the account books is, to first establish that the party was maintaining accounts and yet failed to produce them to the court.[17]

When a party failed to produce relevant account books unless the opposite party made attempts to call the account books, it was held that no adverse ivference can be drawn.[18] Where the court accepts the reasons given by the plaintiff for non-production of the accounts or a relevant document the court cannot draw any adverse inference against the plaintiff for non-production of those documents.[19] Where, at the time the defendant compared the account with the plaintiff, he was shown all the books of account including the Pukki Bahi and the Kachchi Chopadi and it was not suggested by him that there had been interpolations by the plaintiff thereafter, and the plaintiff produced in court all the account books exceping the Kachchi Chopadi, held that much significance could not be attached to the plaintiff's failure to produce the Kachchi Chopadi.[20] Where, according to the plaintiff's case, his account books are not relevant, no inference can be drawn against him for non-production of his books.[21]

It is not obligatory on the part of the court to draw an adverse presumption under Section 114 in every case where account books are not produced. When other evidence which is equivalent to or which can be characterised as substitute for account books is available for the court to come to a reasonable conclusion, it could do so.[22]

32. ALIBI EVIDENCE

The omission on the part of the accused to produce all important evidence in support of his plea of alibi which could easily have been produced raises the presumption against him under illus. (g) to Section 114 Evidence Act, that it would, if produced, have been unfavourable to him.[23]

33. DETENUE

In the absence of affidavit by the State and non-production of relevant files relating to the grounds for detention and service thereof on the detenue within the prescribed period, it may be presumed that, if those files were produced, they would have supported the plea of the detenue.[24] Where the detenue refused to receive the order of detention and the grounds thereof and copies of documents, the order must be presumed to have been served on him.[25]

Where detenue stated that he sent a letter in which he retracted from his original statement before the order of detention and sent a photostat copy of the certificate of posting but did not send the copy of the letter it was held that it could not be presumed that such a letter was posted.[26]

34. MEDICAL EXAMINATION

Where a party refuses to submit to a medical examination in a case where the whole case depends on the state of his or her mind or body, it will be open to the court to draw an adverse inference or presumption against the recalcitrant party.[27]

However, it was held that where a party refused to give blood in a case for determining the paternity between the parties, an adverse inference could not be drawn against the party refusing to give blood.[28]

35. REFUSAL TO ANSWER QUESTIONS [ILLUSTRATION (h)]

Refusal to answer a question is a legitimate ground of unfavourable inference against the person who has to answer the question under Section 148(4), infra. But this illustration does not contemplate the case of witnesses who are not compelled to answer on grounds of privilege (vide Ss. 121-129).

An inference adverse to the accused might be drawn from refusal of the accused to answer when he was examined by the Magistrate before committing him.[29] Thumb impressions of the accused taken in spite of his protests cannot be made use of. But the court may, however, take into consideration his refusal, for drawing presumption against him.[30] When an accused refuses to give specimen writing in spite of a direction by the court to the accused, the court can legally draw presumptions against him. It will not amount to compelling the accused to be a witness against himself.[31] Where the benefit of exemption on import of a certain item initially given to the petitioner under the existing notification was sought to be recovered under a subsequently issued notification but despite Court's direction the Government failed to file a counter-affidavit to show the existence of any public interest or exceptional circumstances that prompted it to issue the subsequent notification, it was held that neither existed and the petitioner was entitled for the said benefit.[32]

36. DISCHARGE OF OBLIGATION [ILLUSTRATION (i)]

This presumption is funded on the natural supposition that a man will protect his own interests by securing his bond before or at the time of discharging it. Where the instrument of a debt and the security for that debt are found in the hands of the debtor, the prima facie presumption is that the debt has been discharged.[34] If a pronote is in the hands of the maker, there is a presumption that it has been paid of. If the drawee alleges that the maker came into possession of the pronote unlawfully, the onus is on him to prove it. This illustration only refers to presumption that may be raised. It does not follow that such presumption would shift the onus of proof. In a suit for money due on a mortgage bond, the plaintiff produced only a copy of the document, alleging in his plaint that it had been lost. The defendant admitted its execution, but alleged that the debt has been discharged, and in support of his allegation he produced the original document containing the endorsement of the mortgagee through her agent of payment of the debt. It was held that the production by the defendant of the bond with the endorsement of payment cast on the plaintiff the burden of proving that the debt was still outstanding.[35] Where the plaintiff filed a suit for recovery of amount due under a mortgage, the defendant produced only the bond creating obligation and denied liability and alleged theft of documents but the title deeds which were deposited by the defendant at the time of mortgage remained with the plaintiff, the privy council held that the presumption in favour of the defendants was considerably weakened by the fact of possession of title deeds of the defendant with the plaintiff.[36] In a suit for possession of property on the ground that there was a mortage by conditional sale, the mortgagor produced the original document showing an endorsement on it that the mortgage consideration was prepaid, it was held that a presumption can be raised in favour of the plaintiff.[37]

In a suit on a bond for money, plaintiff alleged that his non-production of the document was due to the fact that the defendant had stolen it. The defendant admitted the execution of the bond, but alleged that he had paid it; it was held that the burden of proof was on the defendant to prove payment; either by the production of the bond, or other evidence or by both.[38] Where plaintiff sued for money due upon hundis (bills of exchange), but alleged their loss, whilst defendant admitted execution, but pleaded payment and subsequent destruction of the documents, it was held that failing production of the hundies by the defendant there was no presumption that the hundies had been discharged and the onus was upon the defendant to prove payments.[39] In a suit for recovery of unpaid purchase money due under a sale-deed, the defendant produced a discharged pronote with stamps removed. It was held that the initial burden of proof of discharge is on the defendant and the burden can be discharged by proof of payment, by production of a document as it is one of the modes of proof. As the circumstances may show that the defence about the payment is not true. So, it is not obligatory on the court to draw a presumption of discharge of the liability.[40]

37. GENERAL PRESUMPTIONS

(a) Fact in dispute

An inference that a fact in dispute has been established can be drawn from the given objective facts, direct or circumstantial.[41]

(b) Accounts

When a debtor signs the accounts and acknowledges the debt, the presumption is that in signing he accepts the correctness of the accounts.[42]

It would be utterly perverse and indefensible under the law to take the view that the account books of money lenders must be presumed to be forged.[43]

The payment of an amount must be held to have been made on the date on which it was entered in the account books.[44]

(c) Attestation

Where a document appears to be attested by two persons and the evidence of one attesting witness falls short of proof of due attestation of the document, it was held that one could not presume from such signature that the document was attested by the other signatory also.[45]

On failure of the defendant to produce the document despite notice, presumption that the same was duly attested could be drawn.[46]

(d) Authenticity of document

Where the documents in question were unsigned photocopies and did not come from proper custody and were even contradicted by another document, their authenticity was doubtful.[47] Genuineness of a document cannot be presumed merely because the said document has been exhibited and an objection to its genuineness can be entertained.[48] If an instrument is signed by both the parties, it is presumptive of fact that both of them have executed it. Similarly, if it is signed by only one party, it does not mean that both the parties have not executed it together, as it is a question of fact to be determined.[49]

(e) Benami

Whether the nominal owner be a child, wife or a stranger, a purchase made with the money of another is prima facie assumed to be for the benefit of that other.[50]

There is no presumption that what stands in the name of the wife belongs to the husband[51]. Nor is there any presumption that when property stands in the name of a female member of a Hindu family, it is common property of the family.[52]

Where a locker is in joint names of husband and wife, ornaments kept therein must be presumed to belong to both.[53]

This aspect loses significance in view of the Benami Transactions Prohibition Act, 1988 (Act 45 of 1988).

(f) Criminal Law

Presumption arises that mens rea or guilty intent is an essential ingredient of offence. However, the legislature may enact a law giving rise to strict liability where existence of mens rea as an essential element is not necessary.[55]

The accused should always be considered to be innocent till his guilt is affirmatively and satisfactorily proved. This presumption of innocence continues throughout the trial and till the disposal of the case in the final court of appeal. Our jurisprudential enthusiasm for presumed innocence must be moderated by the pragmatic need to make criminal justice potent and realistic. A balance has to be struck between clashing chance possibilities as good enough to set the delinquent free and chopping the logic of preponderant probability to punish the marginal innocents.[56] Where an illegitimate child is found dead, there is no presumption that it was killed by its mother for such a presumption, if permitted, will destroy the presumption of innocence to which every accused is entitled.[57]

No question of presumption arises in respect of facts which prosecution has to prove. Existence of facts cannot be presumed unless they come under Section 114.[58] Where the detailed account of the firing of shot at the deceased was not given in the F.I.R. by the injured witness, no adverse inference could be drawn against the prosecution case as the witness, apart from discomfort on account of injury, was likely to be upset at the unfortunate killing of his close relation before his eyes.[59] In a case of physical torture or abuses hurled on the newly wed daughter-in-law committing suicide, it was held that generally maltreatment is not done in public, hence no adverse inference could be drawn due to non-examination of neighbours.[60] Where heroin and cash were seized under the N.D. and P.S. Act in the presence of the accused from the same place but there was no material on record to link the amount with the sale proceeds of heroin, it could not be presumed that the cash seized was the sale proceeds of heroin.[61]

When in a murder case, the accused falsely denied several relevant facts which had been conclusively established, the court would be justified in drawing an adverse inference against the accused.[62]

The fact that an accused person does not give a detailed statement immediately after the accusation is levelled against him, could hardly be a circumstance from which a presumption of guilt can be drawn.[63] No presumption can be drawn against the accused for not examining himself.[64] Absconding of the accused immediately after the occurrence though a circumstance against the accused, by itself, can not lead to any presumption that he is the murderer. Presence of a person around and at the time and place of occurrence is not sufficient to raise a presumption that he committed the crime.[65] Mere presence at the time of commission of offence is not sufficient to show that the accused was a member of an unlawful assembly.[66] Where the evidence on record was sufficient to prove the prosecution case beyond reasonable doubt, no adverse inference could be drawn for its failure to examine another person.[67] Conspiracy under Section 120-B, I.P.C. cannot be proved merely on the basis of inferences. The inferences have been backed by evidence. If the material put forward by the prosecution is insufficient to bring home the guilt of the accused, then he is entitled to discharge.[68] Prosecution is not under obligation to explain the superficial injuries found on the person of the accused. No adverse inference can be drawn from non-explanation.[69] Where the conduct of the eye-witness, the young daughter of deceased who had seen her father and brother being murdered, was normal and natural in going to her uncle first instead of going to the Police Station with the Sarpanch of the village in that hour of distress, no adverse inference could be drawn against her conduct though her conduct was not as the High Court thought it should have been.[70]

Where in a case of attack at odd hours, certain accused person was present with the other accused persons at the spot and he could offer no plausible explanation as to how and what for he was present there, it could be inferred that, though he was not an assailant, he was a participant in the mission of the accused who launched the attack.[71] Holding out of a threat of doing injury to another furnishes ground to presume that he who threatened the act was the perpetrator or instigator.[72] Unexplained possession of a jewel of a murdered person will be evidence u/s 114 not only regarding theft but also regarding the murder itself if the possession could not be reasonably got without committing the murder.[73] Ordinarily, when a man is found in enclosed premises at night, and when the explanation which he gives for being there is palpably untrue, the inference is that he was in the premises for some criminal purpose.[74] Where the accused was caught while he was entering a railway compartment and on search nine bars of gold with foreign markings were recovered, it was held that a presumption can be drawn that the gold had been illegally imported into the country u/s 111 (d) of the Customs Act and that the accused had necessary knowledge of the character of goods found in his possession. Where an accounts clerk in a bank was charged for withdrawing money from the complainant's accounts and for misappropriation, and in the receipt acknowledging the money the signature was proved to have been forged by the accused, it was held that a presumption for withdrawing the money under the signature for acknowledging the receipt of the money can be raised; and the accused was liable to be convicted.[75] Where an accused refuses to participate in the identification parade or to give specimen of his foot prints an adverse inference can be drawn against him.[76]

Corroboration is necessary for the evidence given by a victim of rape and no presumption can be drawn in such cases and the prosecution has to establish the offence beyond all reasonable doubt.[77] See in this connection Section 114A.

Where an accused was charged u/s. 420 of IPC for issuing cheques for paying balance of goods to the dealer and they were dishonoured and no attempt was made by the accused to pay in sufficient amount for encashment of cheques, it was held that the accused could be presumed to have committed the offence u/s. 420, IPC.[78]

When the prosecution fails to produce in the High Court, some articles connected with murder, though directed by the High Court to produce them, the presumption is against the State.[79]

Where it was shown that there had been attempts to mutilate or disfigure a thumb impression, when the expert examined it for the second time in court, though it was untampered on the first occasion, presumption was held to arise that an attempt had been made by the accused or by some one on their behalf by to mutilate or disfigure the thumb impression.[80] Where the accused is found in possession of paddy, presumption that the accused was a dealer in sale of food grain or atleast in storing food grain for sale can reasonably be drawn if the accused is a person carrying on business.[81] From the fact that accused was found intoxicated at a particular place it cannot be presumed that he must have consumed liquor at that place.[82] Where the complainant alleged the cancellation of marriage by the accused for non-fulfilment of the dowry demand on the basis of a letter written to him by the accused, his failure to produce the alleged letter would invite adverse inference against him.[83]

(g) N.D. & P.S. Act

Where the Officer conducting search and seizure failed to sign on the various documents alleged to have been executed at the spot, no presumption could be drawn that he was not present at the spot at that time or the accused was not apprehended.[84]

By seizure of contraband in the search, conducted in accordance with law, presumption of unlawful possession of contraband can be raised under Section 54 of the N.D. & P.S. Act but in an illegal search.[85] Where the C.F.S.L. form filled up at the spot of the search and seizure, was deposited with the Moharar Malkhana and was not deposited in the Office of C.F.S.L. along with the sample for comparison, presumption that the sample was tampered with could not be ruled out.[86]

(h) Working Order

Where the unlicensed Double Barrel Gun found in the possession the accused was of such a type that it could be fired by first filling it with gun powder and it was found by the Police Officer, trained in handling of guns, that its mechanism was in order, it could reasonably be inferred that it was in working condition and no evidence of an expert or armourer was required.[87]

Mere presence of two empty cartridges in the gun could not lead to the presumption that the gun was in working order.[88]

(i) Custom

Where the whole land in a patti which was once owned by the common ancestor was at the time of regular settlement in possession of his decendants according to ancestral shares and none of the descendants had acquired any land in the patti by purchase or introduced strangers in it by selling any portion of his ancestral holding, it was held that an inference could be drawn from the circumstances of equality of holdings and from a reference to these in terms of ancestral shares in the settlement, that the land had devolved by descent on the descendants.[89] There is an initial presumption in favour of the correctness of entries in Riwaz-i-am. But when a prevailing custom giving rights to females in regard to inheritance is shown, the initial presumption about the correctness of rights to collaterals affecting the rights, of females contained in Riwaj-i-am would get weakened as the females have no opportunity of appearing before the revenue authorities who prepared Riwaj-i-am.[1] Where some muslims accused were found stooping over the dead body of a cow and cutting pieces of flesh, it was held that, since the accused were muslims who would not eat meat of an animal which died a natural death, it may be presumed that cow was killed by them.[2] Presumption that a person acts honestly applies as much in favour of a police officer as of other person, and it is not a judicial approach to distrust and suspect him without good grounds therefor.[3]

From a mere proof of the existence of a custom governing a community permitting brothers to take a common wife, it does not follow that there is a presumption that particular members of the community have acted in accordance with the custom.[4] There is no presumption that a particular tribe in a particular locality is governed by the custom which governs a great many other tribes in the same locality or in other localities.[5] The court cannot presume that the entire Hindu Law as regards inheritance and succession applies to Molesalam Muslim garsias of Baroda territory, unless pleaded and proved.[6]

(j) Death

In the case of simulatenous death presumption may be drawn that deaths occurred in the order of seniority in age and the younger died later than others.[7]

(k) Deeds

There is no presumption about correctness of the recitals in documents.[8] No presumption of due execution can be made from the apparent regularity of execution appearing on the face of a will.[9] Where a person admitted his signature on the document but pleaded what he signed on a blank paper, no presumption can be drawn that he had knowledge of the contents.[10] Where a document written in English is signed by a person who does not know English, without any evidence that the contents were explained to him, the mere signature does not by itself prove that the signatory has understood the contents of the document, and there is no presumption that the executant understood the contents of the document.[11] Where a document is executed by an illiterate and ignorant person and the document contains unconscionable terms, it is difficult to draw the usual presumption arising under Section 114.[12] In the absence of any evidence, the Court would not drawn an inference that the actual price of the property is more than that of the mentioned in the sale-deeds.[13] Where there was an agreement preceding the sale-deed, containing a clause of reconveyance and the sale-deed was executed in consequence thereto, absence of reference to the agreement of reconveyance in the sale-deed would not lead to an inference that the said right was given up by the executant of the sale-deed, unless there is a detailed plea and also evidence that the parties agreed to give it up before execution of the sale-deed.[14]

Where the signature or thumb impression on a document is admitted by the signatory, the presumption is that he must have executed the document.[15] There is a presumption that a document is executed on the day mentioned in it as the date of execution.[16] When it is held that the document was executed with full knowledge of its content and nature, the presumption is that it has come into effect.[17]

The practice prevailing in Madras Presidency is that where a person having a tangible interest in the property affected by a deed, attests the deed, his attestation should be taken as proof of his consent to and knowledge of the correctness of the recitals in the deed.[18] Where the certified copy of a sale-deed was obtained from the volume book maintained in the office of the Sub-Registrar, bearing his seal and certificate of it having been copied from it and compared and the scribe of original was also examined, correctness of the certified copy has to be presumed.[19] Where the plaintiffs claimed title over the suit property on the basis of the certified copy of the sale-deed executed more than 100 years ago in the name of their father, (the original being lost and the executant and attesting witnesses having died) and other documentary evidence viz kist receipts and adangal extracts were found to be in the name of the plaintiff, these documents lead to inference that the document of sale-deed might have come into effect and plaintiff's father obtained title which they inherited.[20]

Presumption of correctness attached to counting of votes is not destroyed merely because a single mistake in counting of ballot papers is defected.[21] Where it is found that the agents of a successful candidate indulged in acts of assault etc. at the polling station in his presence, it may be presumed that such acts were committed with the knowledge and consent of the candidate.[22]

When an election was challenged on the ground of improper acceptance of nomination, there is no presumption that all those votes would have gone to the petitioner.[23] Where a candidate contesting an election was an advocate President of the Bar Association and an influential member of several organisations, and he had formal acquiantance with the returning officer, no presumption of letter's partiality towards the candidate can arise.[24] Where no evidence was produced to show that the advertising agency received payment for the adds. released from the elected candidate who pleaded them to be issued and paid for by different parties whom the petitioner failed to examine to ascertain the truth, no responsibility could be fastened on the elected candidate in respect of them. Further, for the publication of identical adds. in different newspapers on the same dates, no inference could be drawn that they were issued by the returned candidate.[25]

(m) Grant

The word 'Devadayam' is not decisive as to whether inam was granted to temple or was personal inam burdened with service. No presumption whether grant is one in lieu of wages or one burdened with service, may be drawn.[26] There is no presumption that what was granted was only the melwaram right, if the land was not fit for cultivation at the time of the grant.[27] Where the grant is in favour of deity by way of inam, there is no presumption that it is in respect of either Kudivaram or Melwaram.[28] There is no presumption that the grant was burdened with service of rendering puja from the fact that the grantees rendered puja.[29]

(n) Settlement

A land settlement is presumed to be valid and has de facto operation unless declared void by the competent authority.[30]

(o) Status

Where a Govt. order specified certain societies as co-operative societies for certain purposes on th basis of their financial position and share capital and the Govt. included a society's name within tha ambit, there would be presumption that the Govt. had considered its financial position and shar capital.[31]

(p) Prevention of Corruption Act

Under Section 4(1) Prevention of Corruption Act, it has to be presumed that the amount, recovere from the accused was received by him as illegal gratification though such presumption is rebuttable.[3 The accused may rebut such presumption by showing a mere preponderance of probability in hi favour.[33] Under Prevention of Corruption Act a presumption of accepting gratification arises only whe the prosecution proves that whatever the accused received was 'gratification'.[34] To raise a presumptio u/s. 4 (1) of Prevention of Corruption Act the prosecution has to prove that the accused has receive "gratification other than legal remuneration", then receipt of "money" is sufficient to raise th presumption.[35]

Presumption arises as soon as it is shown that the accused had received the stated amount and suc amount was not the legal remuneration. It is not necessary that before presumption arises prosecutio must prove that money was paid as a bribe. See Prevention of Corruption Act (1947). S. 4, AIR 1968 S 1292 : 1968 Cr LJ 1484 : 1968 Lab IC 1412. Where accused received money which was not lega remuneration presumption can be raised under Section 4(1) of the Prevention of Corruption Act that was a bribe.[36] In a case under Prevention of Corruption Act (1947) Section 5(2) against a public servan for possession of assets disproportionate to his income, the prosecution need not disprove all possibl sources of his income.[37]

Presumption illegal gratification raised under S. 4(1) of the Prevention of Corruption Act can b rebutted by the accused by showing mere preponderance of probability in his favour.[38]

(q) Hindu Law—Applicability

Where a Hindu family migrates to another province governed by another law, presumption is that carries with it the law and custom prevailing at the time of migration in the territory from which th family migrated.[39]

(r) Presumption of Union

The joint and undivided family is the normal condition of Hindu society. An undivided Hind family is ordinarily joint not only in estate but in food and worship.[40] The presumption therefore is tha the members of a Hindu family are living in a state of union, unless the contrary is established.[41] Th general principle has no application in cases where one of the coparceners was admittedly separate from the other member of the family.[42] Merely because members lived and worked at different places but owned a joint family house in common it cannot be said that they did not form a joint Hindu family.[43] The strength of the presumption necessarily varies in every case. The presumption of union is stronger in the case of brother[44] than in the case of cousins, and the farther you go from the founder of the family the presumption becomes weaker and weaker.[45] Brothers may be presumed to be joint but conclusion of jointness with collaterals must be affirmatively proved.[46] The presumption in the case of father and son is in favour of jointness.[47] When one of the sons separates from the family, the other sons if they are minor will be presumed to have remained jointly with their father.[48] Where there is no reason to disbelieve evidence adduced by plaintiff to show that the Tharwad is undivided and that the original first plaintiff was the Karnavan and this evidence is unrebutted, it will be presumed that the original first plaintiff was Karnavan and that the Tharwad is undivided. A Hindu family will be presumed to be joint unless the contrary is established.[49]

However, it has been held that merely because a person allowed his brother to stay with him and after the brother's death brought up his orphaned children it could not support the inference of a subsisting joint family between them.[50] The man who has severed his union with his brothers, if he has children, becomes the head of a new joint family, composed of himself and his children, and their issue. And so, property, which was the self-acquisition of the first owner, as soon as it descends to his heirs becomes their joint property, with all the incidents of that condition.[51]

If one of the coparceners of the joint family separated and had his share of the property separated, there is no presumption that the other members of the family continued to be joint. Then the burden is on the person who asserts a particular state of things to prove the same and the question depends on the facts of each case.[52]

There is no presumption that a joint family possesses joint property.[53]

(s) Adoption

Where the execution and registration of the adoption deed were duly proved and performance of adoption ceremonies were also mentioned in it, simply because the 'pundit' was not examined, presumption of its validity could not be negatived.[54]

Presumption as to the validity of a registered document relating to adoption is rebuttable on the basis of evidence.[55]

(t) Joint Property, not a Pre-Requisite

There is no presumption that a family, because it is joint, possesses joint property.[56] Possession of property is not under the Mitakshara law a necessary requisite for the constitution of a joint family[57] though where persons live together, joint in food and worship, it is difficult to conceive of their possessing no property whatever, such as ordinary household articles which they would enjoy in common. Hindu law does not require that properties of a joint family should be immovable properties or that they should be of appreciable value[58]. (MAYNE'S HINDU LAW, para: 278, page: 548). However, where there is no evidence on record to show that the partition between the members of a joint family has taken place, the property would be presumed to be a joint family property.[59]

The burden of proving that a particular property is joint family property is on the person who claims that it is joint family property. Where the possession of a sufficient nucleaus was either admitted or proved, acquisition made by a member is presumed to be joint family property. Then the burden shifts to the person claiming the property as his self-acquisition property.[60] After it has been proved that the property concerned was purchased from the joint family funds, only then the question of presumption that it was joint family property would rise.[61] Where the father and the sons, not a Joint Hindu Family, carried on business in partnership and property was purchased in the name of the eldest son, presumption would be that it was the property of the son in whose name the purchase was made. If the consideration was paid from the business, further presumption would be that the same was paid from the share of the concerned partner.[62]

Where the father of the defendants and that of the plaintiff are shown to have hailed from a common ancestor, the presumption would be that the land in question devolved upon both the branches and not on one branch alone. Amongst the co-sharers the inference of ouster cannot be lightly drawn, and the possession of one co-sharer will enure for that of another unless such ouster is pleaded and proved by specific evidence.[63]

(See para: 311, pages 583 to 586 and para 312, pages 587 to 589 of Mayne's Hindu Law 13th Edition).

The eldest member of a Joint Hindu family is presumed to be its Manager.[64] Where there was no evidence that the karta of the joint family had no other source of income and his widow brought evidence on record that the suit property was acquired out of the funds of the family, presumption arises that the said acquisition enured to the benefit of the family and hence was co-parcenary.[65]

(a) Burden of Proof

Where a sale or mortgage is made by a father, the burden of proof is upon the alienee to show that the alienation is either for an antecedent debt or was made for legal necessity or the benefit of the family. Where it is proved that the alienation was for an antecedent debt, it is for the sons to show that the debt was contracted to the knowledge of the lender for immoral or illegal purposes[66], for it is strictly not a case of alientation by a managing member for a legal necessity or for the benefit of the estate.

Where an alienation of joint family property is made by a manager, the burden of proof lies upon the person who claims the benefit of the alienation to establish one of two things: (1) the transaction was in point of fact justified by legal necessity or was for the benefit of the joint estate, or (2) he had made reasonable and bona fide inquiry as to the existence of the necessity and satisfied himself that the Manager was acting for the benefit to the estate.[67] "The burden remains heavily upon the mortgagee to establish compliance with the conditions under which the Hindu law permits the interest of the minor members to be taken from them". But if the sons fail to produce family account books proved to be in their possession, the onus shifts on to them on account of the presumption arising under Section 114(g) of the Evidence Act against them.[68] If the purchaser had acted honestly, if the existence of a family necessity for sale was made out and the price was not unreasonably low, the purchaser was not bound to account for the application of whole of the price[69]. A lender of money may reasonably be expected to prove the circumstances connected, with his own particular loan, but cannot reasonably be expected to know, or come prepared with proof of antecedent economy and good conduct of the owner of the joint family estate. The proper presumption to be made will vary with circumstances, and must be regulated by, and dependent on them. Thus, where the mortgagee himself, with whom the transaction took place, is setting up a charge in his favour made by one whose title to alienate he necessarily knew to be limited and qualified, he may be reasonable expected to allege and prove facts presumably better known to him than to the infant heir, namely, those facts which embody the representations made to him of the alleged needs of the estate, and the motives influencing his immediate loan (The representation by the Manager accompanying the loan are part of the res gestae and evidence against those whom the Manager represents). It is obvious, however, that it might be unreasonable to require such proof from one not an original party, after the lapse of much time and enjoyment, and apparent acquiscence[70] Where a new security is substituted for an older one, or where the consideration for the older one was an old precedent debt of an ancestor not previously questioned, a presumption in favour of the validity of the transaction would in proper cases be reasonable.[71] It depends on the facts and circumstances of each case to the extent and nature of the enquiry that should be made by a lender whom the Manager approaches for the purposes of alienating joint family property in order to secure a loan[72] It is not sufficient for the creditor simply to show that the money borrowed was spent for a family purpose which ordinarily is met by family income. He will have to further show that circumstances existed at the time which justified the borrowing.[73]

Regarding the burden of proof in the case of an alienation by a Hindu widow. See paras 691 to 693, pages 915 to 917 Mayne's Hindu Law 13th Ed.

Any person who seeks to displace the natural succession of property by alleging an adoption must discharge the burden that lies upon him by proof of the factum of adoption and the performance of any necessary ceremonies as well as all such facts as are necessary to constitute a valid adoption.[74] It is not necessary in all cases to produce direct evidence of the fact of the adoption: where it took place long ago, and where the adopted son has been treated as such by the members of the family and in public transactions, every presumption will be made that every circumstance has taken place which is necessary to account for such a state of things as is proved, or admitted, to exist.[75]

In case of presumption of valid marriage, it was pleaded that the marriage was prohibited by Hindu Bigamous Marriage Act, it was held that onus to prove the plea was on the party who sought to rebut the presumption.[76]

Where the burden to prove bona fide purchase by the subsequent purchaser was illegally shifted to the plaintiff without notice, adverse inference had to be drawn against the subsequent purchaser.[77]

Onus was on the Insurance Company to prove its allegation that the driver of the vehicle was not holding a valid driving licence on the date of accident and if the driver did not appear in spite of summons, adverse inference could be drawn against him.[78]

(v) Partition

Where there has been a partition, the presumption is that it was complete both as to parties (1) and (2) property. The presumption however is one of fact and not of law and will vary with the circumstances of each case.[79]

(w) Insanity

Law presumes every one to be of sound mind until the contrary is proved. Burden of proving that he was not criminally responsible for crime by reason of his unsound mind is on the accused.[80]

Where previous insanity is admitted, presumption of sanity at the time of commission of act would be greatly weakened.[81] When the opinion of the medical expert is in favour of sanity, no adverse inference could be raised merely because the expert was not examined.[82]

(x) Intention and Knowledge

Every person is presumed to know the natural consequences of his acts.[83] Where a Police Constable beats an old man of sixty years weighing only 38 kg. which resulted in breaking of his ribs leading to his death, it would be presumed that he intended the consequences of act.[84] Intention of murder can be inferred from the nature and number of injuries.[85]

In Phipson 13th Ed. para 41-20, page: 1056 it is observed: "It was formerly thought that a man is presumed to intend the natural consequences of his acts; and where this presumption is conclusive no evidence contra will be allowed, though it is otherwise where it is disputable. But although this presumption was given the support of the House of Lords[86], the position, in criminal cases at least, is that no such presumption exists any more." "In criminal cases, some of the doubts and difficulties which arose as a result of the speeches in the House of Lords in DPP v. Smith[87] have been resolved by Section 8 of the Criminal Justice Act, 1967.

> "A Court or jury, in determining whether a person has committed an offence—(a) shall not be bound in law to infer that he intended or foresaw a result of his actions by reason only of its being a natural and probable consequence of those actions; but (b) shall decide whether he did intend or foresee that result by reference to all the evidence drawing such inferences, from the evidence as appear proper in the circumstances."

Paragraph (b) has been interpreted, however, as "no more than a legislative instruction that in considering their findings on intention or foresight the jury must take into account all the relevant evidence."

As a general rule, proof that a person knew that an act was likely to have certain consequences is relevant evidence which may found an inference that he intended those consequences when he did the act.[88] It seems, however, that in cases of murder a person can only be found to have intended a consequence which he did not desire if he foresaw the consequence as a virtual certainty, and that in such cases "a result foreseen as virtually certain is an intended result."[89] But this does not contradict the proposition that where it is relevant to prove that a consequence was desired it is relevant to prove that the person knew of the likelihood of such a consequence. In civil cases, it seems that the Courts will act on the presumption that a man intends the natural consequences of his acts."[90]

If it does survive in civil cases, it is clear that where there is any doubt as to the consequences of the act, evidence may be adduced on the subject. Thus, where A is alleged to have passed off his goods as those of B, and a comparison of the goods, explained by surrounding circumstances shows that A's goods are calculated to deceive, the presumptijon will be conclusive, and evidence of A's intention to deceive or the reverse will be inadmissible; while, if such comparison and explanation leave the matter doubtful, his actual intent may be shown[1]. Departure from England without making business arrangements necessarily has the effect of defeating, or at least of delaying, creditors, and, therefore, is in itself proof of intent to produce that effect but evidence may be brought to show that in fact there was no such intention.[2]

Where the record of the case was not produced in the Court by the Collector in spite of sufficient opportunities, adverse inference that the record was intentionally withheld could be drawn.[3]

Section 8 of the Criminal Justice Act, 1967[4] provides that a court, or jury, in determining whether a person has committed on offence, is not bound in law to infer that he intended or foresaw a result of his actions by reason only of its being a natural and probable consequence of those actions. Rather, it must decide whether he did intend or foresee that result by reference to all the evidence, drawing such inferences from the evidence as appear proper in the circumstances. "Section 8 deals with the matter of evidence.....it does not lay down in what cases the establishment of guilt is dependent on proof of intention or foresight or any other mental state".[5]

The presumption of intention is not a proposition of law, but a proposition of ordinary good sense. The burden to prove intention is on the prosecution.[6] Where a prosecution is lodged with knowledge that accused has committed no offence, presumption of malice can be made.[7]

Where the dead body of the victim of rape was found on the cot of the accused inside his house, in the absence of any satisfactory explanation from him, implication of the circumstance is definitely adverse to him as it must be in his special knowledge.[8] Where the landlord sent notice to the tenant offering him the reconstructed premises which and subsequent notices also the tenant refused to accept , it raises presumption that the tenant had the knowledge of the offer of the premises to him.[9]

(y) Lost Grant

When a person is found in possession and enjoyment of land for a considerable period of time under an assertion of title without challenge, Courts are inclined to ascribe a legal origin to such possession, and when on the facts a title by prescription could not be sustained, a presumption could be made that the possession was referable to a grant by the owner entitled to the land, but that such grant had been lost. Such a presumption is made for securing ancient and continued possession, which can otherwise be reasonably accounted for. But it is not a 'presumptio juris et de jure' and the Courts are not bound to raise it, if the facts in evidence are against it. So also the presumption is not made if there is any legal impediment to the making of it. There will likewise be no scope for this presumption, if there is no person capable of making a grant, or if the grant would have been illegal and beyond the powers of the grantor.[10]

The presumption of lawful title is not a mere branch of the law of evidence. Courts have recourse to it in the absence of evidence. Their Lordships of the Privy Council observed: "The matter is one of presumption, based on the policy of law, but even considered as an inference from proved facts, the title presumed is a thing, which may well be regarded as likely to have happened. At the same time it is not a presumption to be capriciously made, nor is it one which a certain class of possessor is entitled to de jure. In a case such as this, where it is necessary to indicate what particular kind of lawful title is being presumed, the court must be satisfied that such a title was in its nature practicably and reasonably capable of being presumed, without doing violence to the probabilities of the case.....It is the completion of a right, to which circumstances clearly point, where time has obliterated any record of the original commencement."[11]

In order to claim a right of occupancy based on the ground of presumption of lost grant, it is necessary and incumbent on the tenants to trace the history of different lands in possession of different tenants and to establish before Court the length of possession.[12]

(z) Marriage—Husband and Wife

The presumption of law is in favour of marriage and against concubinage when a man and a woman have cohabited continuously for a long number of years[13] and omission to mention her name and that of her sons in the will executed by the husband's father and also the absence of their reference in the compromise entered into between her husband and his brothers do not destroy the presumption of legality of their marriage.[14] Where the parties consistently, continuously and openly lived as husband and wife, cohabited together for a long period and had children and were regarded and recognised by friends and relatives as husband and wife, it furnishes a clear evidence of marriage raising the presumption unless it is shown that the connection started in mere concubinage. But before raising such a presumption, it is necessary that the requisite conditions of a valid marriage stood satisfied in the sense that such a marriage was not prohibited under the law.[15]

Continuous cohabitation of a man and a woman as husband and wife and their treatment as such for a number of years may raise the presumption of marriage. But the presumption which may be drawn from long cohabitation is rebuttable, and if there are circumstances which weaken or destroy that presumption, the court cannot ignore them.[16] It was held that the rebuttal cannot be evidence of mere probability.[17] Alongwith the presumption of validity of marriage on the basis of long cohabitation, the formality and customs for valid marriage would also be presumed to have been performed.[18]

When a person is already married, no presumption of a second marriage arises by reason of long cohabitation[19] unless divorced.[20]

Mere continuance of cohabitation is not sufficient to raise a presumption of marriage. To raise such a presumption, the continued cohabitation must be under circumstances from which it could reasonably be inferred that the cohabitation was as man and wife without obstacle to the form of marriage being gone through between them.[21]

Where the connection starts in mere concubinage the presumption does not arise. In such a case the presumption would be that the illicit connection continued till marriage is proved.[22]

Cohabitation with public women cannot give rise to a presumption of valid marriage.[23] A Kudipiravarthi woman (i.e. Devadasi) can contract a legal marriage. A rebuttable presumption of marriage from long cohabitation can be drawn in her case just as in the case of any other Hindu woman.[24]

In the absence of any contention that a particular ceremony is necessary in the re-marriage of a widow with a second husband, the fact that the woman lived for a considerably long time with the person as his wife, will be sufficient to establish that she was the wife of that person. There would be a presumption of re-marriage in favour of the lady.[25]

Where there were documentary evidence like the birth certificate and the marriage invitation and tax receipt in the name of plaintiff after his alleged father's death, it would be sufficient to draw the presumption of marriage between his mother and the alleged father which would not be rebutted merely because the plaintiff had not signed a document alongwith his alleged father and his other children and also because the alleged father had denied the marriage in reply to a legal notice to him by the plaintiff.[26] Where a person signs in the school admission register as father of children, the presumption would be that there is valid marriage between the person and the mother of those children.[27] Where marriage and the ceremonies observed at the time of marriage have been proved, it may be presumed that all legal formalities have been complied with.[28] Where factum of marriage was otherwise proved from evidence of witnesses and long cohabitation but the marriage register could not be produced for which satisfactory explanation was given, the factum of marriage was held to be proved.[29] When celebration of some form of marriage is established there is justification of presumption of legal marriage.[30]

There is no presumption that the property owned or held by a woman necessarily belongs to her husband or that the money for the acquisition of such a property had been supplied to her by the husband or somebody else.[31]

An able-bodied husband is presumed to be capable of maintaining his wife and children.[32] Incapacity to consummate may be assumed from persistent refusal by the husband to consummate marriage.[33]

It is one of the strongest presumptions based on human experience that a woman must be unchaste when her children say so in the court, though the said presumption is rebuttable.[34]

In a petition for dissolution of marriage on the ground that the respondent is incurably of unsound mind, it is for the petitioner to establish such unsoundness of mind. There is no provision in law for compelling the respondent to undergo medical examination. However, an adverse inference can be drawn against the respondent for refusing to submit to medical examination[35] but if she did not go for medical examination for want of fund, no adverse inference could be drawn against her for it was the duty of the husband to pay the expenses for such examination.[36] In a divorce proceeding on the ground of allegations of adultery against the wife, onus was on the husband to prove his allegations in which he failed. The wife was given an opportunity to mend her ways and thereafter husband and wife lived together. Condonation of offence of adultery by the husband could be presumed.[37]

In a matrimonial suit brought by the husband, non-production of the compromise petition of an earlier occasion by the husband in evidence would raise a presumption about a state of affairs adverse to the petitioner.[38] Where a woman alleged to be married is not examined, inference is that, had she been examined, she would not have supported the plea of her marriage.[39]

(aa) Legitimacy

When a woman lives for a number of years in close association with a man and bears children, who are acknowledged by the man as born to him, and the relations and other persons of the village treat them as such, there is a presumption of legitimacy.[40] Where consummation of marriage and access of husband and wife were admitted and the medical opinion supported the wife, legitimacy of the child was presumed even after refusal of wife to submit to DNA Test.[41] If a child is in possession of affiliation acknowledged by the parents and has repute in the society, legitimacy should be presumed.[42] A youth of 15 years is not incapable of procreation. Hence from mere age alone, no conclusive inference that he could not possibly have been the father of a child can be made.[43]

(ab) Partner

Where a lease is renewed by a partner there is a presumption that the renewal is for the benefit of the other partners.[44]

(ac) Principal and Agent

An agent's authority to bind the principal may be presumed. Onus is on the principal to prove that the agent's authority is limited.[45]

There is no presumption that the husband acted as an agent of his wife, when he sold the properties of his wife under a contract, unless it is proved that he had either express or implied authority to sell the property. Implied authority within the meaning of Section 187 Contract Act arises from the conduct or situation of the parties or necessity of the family.[46]

Where a trade union takes action, the presumption is that it has taken such action with the support of its members and in a representative capacity.[47]

(ad) Money Transactions

In the absence of a receipt for the deposit of money no inference can be drawn that the money was deposited as it would throw very great doubt about the deposit.[48]

Payment by means of demand draft cannot be presumed to be a loan.[49]

The fact that a certain sum is paid towards principal on a certain date does not justify the conclusion that interest up to that date has been paid.[50]

Where in a case of default of payment in purchase of a T.V. on credit basis, the vendor pleaded that the purchaser had agreed to pay Rs. 100/- as penalty for each default in payment of instalements but he failed to produce the said agreement, an adverse inference could be drawn against him.[51] Where in a case for recovery of loan, the bank produced the certified copies of the banker's book to prove the loan and also examined its employees as witnesses, the debtor firm did not examine its partner who was conservant with the firm's dealings and also did not produce its account books, adverse inference could be drawn against the firm.[52]

(ae) Dishonour of Cheque

The presumption that the cheque was drawn for the discharge of liability of the drawer is a presumption of law, though rebuttable, and ought to be raised by the Court in every case.[53]

(af) Mortgage

Though there is no presumption of law that mere deposit of title deeds constitutes a mortgage, courts may presume under Section 114 of the Evidence of Act that under certain circumstances, a loan and a deposit of title deeds constitute a mortgage.[54]

Where possession of the mortgaged property repeatedly changed hands, no presumption can be drawn that the possession of such other person was without any right and he was in unlawful possession, as he may be an assignee of mortgage.[55]

No presumption as to the value of the property mortgaged can be raised from the amount of the loan advanced.[56]

(ag) Pledge

The National Saving Certificate, being the property of the post office, can be pledged only by it. It having been pledged by the Post Master in favour of a party, presumption that the pledging is proper arises.[57]

(ah) Mohammedan Law

As the great majority of Muslims in India follow the Hanafi School of Sunni law, the Courts presume that Muslims in India follow the Hanafi law unless the contrary is alleged and proved.[58]

The presumption of advancement applicable to deposits in the joint names of father and daughter cannot be extended to Mohammedans in India.[59]

Presumption of lawful marriage among Muslims can be drawn from continuous cohabitation.[60] Regarding a Muslim marriage it was held that, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, it must be presumed that the marriage was duly solemnized and that words of acceptance were uttered by the husband. The presumption is fortified by the fact that marriage has been consummated.[61]

(ai) Negligence

No presumption of negligence can be drawn in a civil case simply because the person was convicted in a criminal case for negligence.

The Maxim res ipsa loquitur (things speak for themselves) used in cases of tort in civil cases is not applicable in criminal cases. The Supreme Court observed: "The primary reasons for non-application of this abstract doctrine of res ipsa loquitur to criminal trial are: Firstly, in a criminal trial, the burden of proving everything essential to the establishment of the charge against the accused always rests on the prosecution, as every man is presumed to be innocent until the contrary is proved, and criminality is never to be presumed subject to statutory exception. No such statutory exception has been made by requiring the drawing of a mandatory presumption of negligence against the accused where the accident "tells its own story" of negligence of somebody. Secondly, there is a marked difference as to the effect of evidence, viz the proof in civil and criminal proceedings. In civil proceedings, a mere preponderance of probability is sufficient, and the defendant is not necessarily entitled to the benefit of every reasonable doubt; but in criminal proceedings, the persuasion of guilt must amount to such a moral certainty as convinces the mind of the court, as a reasonable man beyond all reasonable doubt. Where negligence is an essential ingredient of the offence, the negligence to be established by the prosecution must be culpable or gross and not the negligence merely based upon an error of judgement."[62] As pointed out by Lord ATKIN in Andrews v. Director of Public Prosecutions[63] "simple lack of care such as will constitute civil liability, is not enough" for liability under the criminal law "a very high degree of negligence is required to be proved. Probably, of all the epithets that can be applied 'reckless' most nearly covers the case".[64]

It was held by the Supreme Court that the mere fact that a person was knocked down by a motorist and killed, there can not be any presumption of negligence on the part of the driver. There must be clear proof showing that there was a direct nexus between the death of person and the rash or negligent act of the accused.[65] Where plea of sudden failure of lights and foggy weather as cause of accident was not established, negligence on the part of the driver could be presumed.[66]

Where a fire explosive, in a display of fire works, fell in the midst of crowd and injured an on looker, it was held that a presumption of negligence on the part of person making and displaying the fire explosive, may be raised.[67]

Where a consignment of mangoes reached the destination two days later than the reasonable time, it was held that a delay of two days is not unreasonable and no presumption that damage was due to delay of two days could be drawn.[68]

"The law will conclusively presume that the carrier has been guilty of negligence unless he can show that the loss or damage was occasioned by what it technically called the "act of God," or by King's enemies. The same principle applies to goods under the custody of a stage-coachman, a cabman, or even a gratuitous bailee". (TAYLOR ON EVIDENCE (See 187)).

As a rule negligence is not to be presumed. But in the case of common carriers or bailment, and loss, law presumes negligence on the part of the bailee.[69]

In a suit against the railway for damages for loss of goods in transit, non-disclosure as to how the consignment was dealt with in transit by the railway administration leads to presumption of negligence on the part of the railway.[70] In a suit for loss, damage or non-delivery of goods, filed against the carriers, the presumption is in favour of the plaintiff and against the defendant that he is liable to make good the loss. He can rebutt the presumption by establishing that the loss was caused by the act of God or inevitable accident or something beyond his control.[71] Mere fact that rain water entered the wagon and caused damage would not fix liability on the railway.[72] In a suit for damages for short delivery alleging negligence against the railway, inference of negligence or misconduct can be inferred, if the railway fails to disclose to consignor how the consignment was dealt with in transit.[73] Where a consignment of goods was sent by railway and the goods were either lost or damaged because of the derailment, it was held that a rebuttable presumption of negligence on the part of the railway employees arises.[74] Where there is an arrangement between two railways by which one acted as agent of the other in entering into contract of carriage an act of one is binding on the other, the fact that goods were placed in charge of one railway and not returned by the other raises a presumption of negligence on the part of the railway and it is for them to rebut that presumption.[75] Consignments delivered to a railway, may have to travel on railways of two or three different administration, it is not safe to presume that a particular consignment was received intact by each railway from the previous railway.[76]

Where in a rental premises, the tenant stored combustible substances and fire took palce, negligence can be presumed unless rebutted.[77]

The possibility of stealth by a person other than the bailee is not sufficient to rebut the presumption of negligence against a bailee on the happening of loss.[78]

Where a newly born infant was injured at night in a Govt. owned hospital, presumption of fact regarding negligence of the hospital staff would arise.[79]

(aj) Notice

Where a notice is addressed to the Secretary, Railway Board instead of the General Manager, it cannot be presumed under Section 114 that a wrong addressee would immediately forward the communication to the person who was bound to receive it.[80]

Refusal to accept notice amounts to service in accordance with law.[81] Where the lessee alleged that he received the lease termination notice late thus not allowing him 15 clear days' time as required but failed to produce the envelop of notice to show the date of delivery to him besides taking no specific stand about the date of receipt of the notice in the written statement and showing no record of receipt of the said notice, adverse inference would be drawn against him.[82] Where the landowner whose land was acquired did not raise the issue of non-service of land acquisition notice, rather the objection was raised by the person acquiring title through him after a lapse of 20 years, it was presumed that the requisite notice was duly served.[83]

(ak) Ownership and Possession

Title carries with it the presumption of possession.[84] If none can prove possession the court must hold that possession is with the rightful owner.[85] Where possession may be either lawful or unlawful, the court, in the absence of evidence, shall presume the former[86] but before coming to the conclusion that possession of the petitioners, claimed by virtue of registered sale-deeds in respect of land belonging to a tribal obtained after permission from the District Collector, was without the authority of law, the pleas of the petitioners must be considered.[87]

There is no presumption regarding the fact of adverse possession.[88] The report of the Commission and the plan of land, submitted in a different suit concerning a different issue, cannot be taken into consideration to presume the finding of adverse possession without examining the said Commissioner.[89] Where title to a waste land incapable of effective enjoyment, was found vested in the plaintiff, presumption arose that possession followed title.[90] Possession of one co-owner is presumed in law to be possession of all co-owners even when others do not participate in profits and the principle of adverse possession does not apply. There can not be adverse possession unless established by cogent evidence showing open assertion of hostile title or repudiation of others title or express ouster, to the knowledge of other co-owners.[91]

The person in whose name the properties stands in survey and settlement registers can be presumed to be the real owner thereof.[92]

The initial presumption is that a building constructed on land after a person acquired title to the land, is also owned by such person.[93] Presumption is that trees in holding belong to the person to whom the holding belongs.[94]

The person who is in possession is presumed to have prima facie title against all the world except the real owner but the presumption that possession follows title is rebuttable. In case of acquisition of land the original owner ceases to have the right, title or interest in it and cannot transfer any part thereof. In case he executes a sale-deed the transferee would be a tresspasser, if he comes into possession.[95]

Where the co-owner did not participate in taking rents and profits for a very long time, there is presumption of ouster.[96] Where there is a deposit in the joint names of A and B and there is no evidence to show that money deposited belonged to A, the reasonable conclusion that can be drawn from the joint nature of the deposit is that it belongs equally to both of them.[97] Where there is no indication or evidence as to the extent of share of each of the claimants to compensation, the presumption would be that they share equally.[98]

(al) User

User from times immemorial raises a presumption that the enjoyment had a lawful origin.[99]

Mere user of a piece of waste land as passage does not give rise to a presumption that the user was a matter of right.[1]

Public user should be as of right and without interruption in order to raise a presumption of dedication.[2]

Where Muslim residents of a village were burying the dead in a plot of land and continued to do so even after the U.P. Zamindari Abolition Act, 1951 and the defendants recognised the user, it was held there was a presumption that the plot was dedicated for user as a grave yard.[3] When a vehicle is given to an employee in the course of his employment, the presumption arises that the employee was entitled to use both for official and non-official purposes unless there is evidence that the user was restricted.[4]

Where a water course is running on another's land, a right to user cannot be acquired on the basis of presumption under S. 114, illus. (e) of the Evidence Act.[5]

(am) Wills

Onus of proving a Will is on propounder and in the absence of suspicious circumstances surrounding the execution of the Will, proof of testamentary capacity and signature of testator as required by law is sufficient to discharge the onus.[6] Where it was alleged that a certain will was executed under fraud and undue influence but no evidence was adduced to support the allegation, validity of the will was inferred.[7]

Where a Will was executed in favour of his newly wedded wife and the testator died after a few months, no presumption can be drawn that the woman was in a position to dominate his Will.[8]

Where a duly executed will was found missing at the time of the testator's death, presumption that the will was revoked should be applied with care.[9] A court may resort to presumption that where the Will is traced to the possession of the testator but is not forth-coming after his death, it must have been destroyed by the testator with the intention to revoke it.[10]

Where an ancient will is rational in character and was executed in the presence of witnesses, the presumption that the testator was of sound mind is justified.[11] In cases of Wills the presumption is that the attesting witnesses signed after the testator had signed. The presumption is based on the maxim 'Omnia praesumuntur rite esse acta.[12]

(an) Miscellaneous

Where a person in Baroda entered into agreement with the Government of India at Delhi to supply goods and the payment for goods was to be made by cheque, it was held that according to the course of business usage in general, parties must have intended that cheque should be sent by post.[13]

There is no presumption in law that a person who possesses only a learner's licence or possesses no licence at all, does not know driving.[14]

Where A's land adjoins B house and is to the north of B's house, and B opens a door in the north wall of his house with the purpose of having access to north; A is entitled to relief for apprehended trespass against B for his land. A has reasonable apprehension that the opening of the door is a first step towards subsequent act of trespass against his land.[15]

Where a date expired medicine is kept in a drug shop, the presumption is that the medicine is stocked for sale.[16] The statement about the date of expiry given by the manufacturer on the drug is at best a statement about a future occurrence and therefore it cannot be regarded as a fact within the meaning of Section 114 because it does not indicate any such common course of natural events, human conduct and public and private business as may be relevant to the question whether the drug would or would not be rendered unfit for analysis after the date of expiry. In the instant case, after the analysis of the sample a particular drug was found to be not confirming to the claim in respect of its contents.[17]

There can be no presumption that when person was discharged from general hospital there was no necessity for detaining him any further in hospital when it is common knowledge that for want of accommodation several persons are discharged before complete recovery.[18]

(ao) Statutory Presumption

There is a presumption of the constitutional validity of a statutory provision. The Supreme Court should lean in favour of the view as would sustain the validity of the provision and not disturb a construction which has been accepted for such a length of time.[19]

Rule 141(2) of Defence of India Rules 1962 is not ultra vires as laying down a rule of evidence contrary to Section 114.[20]

There is every presumption that a change of sovereignty would not affect private rights to property.[21]

From the mere conduct of an accused, neither the existence of the order nor its due publication nor its knowledge by the accused, can be inferred. Before any presumption of due publication can arise, it must be shown that the order in question u/r. 81(2) of Defence of India Rules (1939) was made in strict compliance with the provision of Rule 119.[22] Statutory presumption under Section 5 of the TADA Act, 1987 is rebuttable and the accused can prove that his purpose was wholly unrelated to any terrorist or disruptive activity.[23]

When a person enters India on a passport issued by the Government of Pakistan, a presumption that he has acquired the citizenship of that country arises. Such a presumption is rebuttable.[24] Issue of an Indian passport to a person though not conclusive on the point of Indian citizenship, raises a rebuttable presumption in his favour.[25]

In a criminal proceeding under the Hyderabad Gambling Act, the Court may presume that an officer issuing warrant has acted on credible information.[26] Where opium is recovered from a car during transport, all occupants of the car may be presumed to commit the offence under Sections 9 and 10 of the Opium Act (1878).[27] Presumption under S. 178-A Customs Act (1878), cannot be raised when article seized is not covered by S. 178A(2).[28] Where presumption under Section 123 of the Customs Act could not be availed of as the seizure of gold biscuits was not done in accordance with the Act, it was held that in certain special circumstances the prosecution can fall back upon the presumption under Section 114. Under Bengal (Bihar) Tenancy Act, there is a rebuttable presumption that the land is not the proprietor's land.[29] Section 185 of Madras Estates Land Act (I of 1908) enacts a presumption that land in an inam village is not private land.[30]

When a dealer was found in possession of excess number of kerosene tins than shown in the register, in the absence of a reasonable explanation, a presumption arises that he intended to sell the excess tins in the black market.[31] Statutory presumption of correctness attaches to the entry in books regularly maintained by a limited company, it is for the person alleging the contrary to prove it.[32] A resolution of a company signed by its Chairman must be presumed to be correct.[33]

There can be no presumption that proceedings under R. 16, 24(ix) of the Punjab Police Rules were taken but, once it is admitted or proved that such proceedings were, in fact, taken then it must be presumed, unless otherwise alleged and proved, that they were taken in accordance with law.[34]

The declaration that a certain person is the owner, printer and publisher of a particular newspaper to be issued from a particular place, only raises a presumption of publication at that particular place and does not extend to the publication of any issue of newspaper at any other place.[35] Where a party alleges bias in the matter of decision of the Government acting under Section 10 of the Industrial Disputes Act, the Government should be presumed to act with complete propriety and without any bias unless evidence to the contrary is presented by the party alleging bias.[36]

In view of the definition of "goods vehicle" in the Motor Vehicle Act, a presumption that the driver of the goods vehicle picked up the passenger in the course of his employment cannot be drawn.[37]

The date of birth recorded in the matriculation certificate is not necessarily conclusive proof of such date.[38]

(ap) Interpretation of statute

Principle of presumption would be applicable equally in case of rule making authority. The provisions of a statute are to be interpreted harmoniously making the provisions clear and every part of the statute is to be given effect.[39]

(aq) Repeal of an Act

It is a well-settled principle of law that there is presumption against implied repeal of an Act.[40]

(ar) Landlord and Tenant

There is no presumption that a lease deed contained a term prohibiting the tenant from subletting.[41] Where a land was given on lease for building purpose and no period of tenancy was fixed, the presumption arises in favour of permanent tenancy. Giving a right to the lessee to surrender the lease at any time does not affect the nature of tenancy.[42]

Inaction on the part of a landlord for a long time in taking steps for eviction, does not lead to the presumption that he had consented to the sub-tenancy[43] but adverse inference could be drawn against him for his failure to appear in a case seeking eviction on the basis of bona fide need.[44]

Where the notice for termination of tenancy was issued by the landlord to the tenant at his residential address in accordance with law, presumption arose that the same was duly served on him.[45] A presumption may be raised that the occupier of a room in a hotel is a lodger or inmate.[46]

Presumption as to forest lands in Kerala is that in absence of exceptional circumstances such as the land being entirely rocky or barren, all forest lands is agricultural land in the sense that it can be prudently and profitably exploited for agricultural purpose.[47]

Coconut, arecanut, jack, rubber, mango trees and pepper vine that were in existence in a particular year may be presumed to be in existence three years later.[48]

Where a person is recorded in the settlement record as raiyat of tank, presumption is that he is raiyat. However, the presumption is rebuttable.[49] Where a tenant was inducted by the ex-landlord from whom the present landlord purchased the premises and prior to the filing of eviction proceedings the ex-landlord and his munim died, no adverse inference could be drawn on the ground of failure of the present landlord to examine them.[50]

Where the premises in question was found to be in possession of a stranger and not a tenant, inference of sub-letting could be drawn[51] and it would also be presumed that the sub-letting must be for valid consideration.[52] Where in an eviction suit, the landlord plaintiffs, instead of examining themselves, examined the senior member of their family who was managing family affairs, no adverse inference could be drawn against them for not appearing as witnesses.[53] Where the tenant had sufficient means to acquire alternative accomodation, grant of permission for eviction on the ground of the tenant having sufficient means by drawing adverse inference against the tenant was held to be proper.[54] Where after the death of the husband his wife was recorded as a tenant in the revenue records and thereafter as a mortgagee, the change in revenue entries does not indicate cessation of tenancy. It only indicates that husband and thereafter the wife was tenant and the tenancy of the wife will revert to her after redemption of mortgage.[55]

Where the tenant had produced the certified copy of the admission of his tenancy by the landlord, adverse inference could not be drawn against the tenant on the ground that he did not summon the respondent/landlord[56] but where the tenant could produce no evidence of his plea that the other person was a business partner, adverse inference could be drawn against the tenant and he could be evicted.[57] The application by the landlord by post to the Rent Controller that the house was vacant and could be alloted to anyone could be presumed to be genuine only when the applicant is summoned and enquiry is made.[58]

Under the Bihar Buildings (Lease, Rent and Eviction) Control Act, 1982, Section 11(1)(c), the presumption, that the requirement of the plaintiff will not be substantially met if the defendant is directed to vacate a portion of one room suit premises, does not arise where the room is big enough to permit division to satisfy the needs of the landlord as well as the tenant.[59]

Presumption of service of notice is a finding of fact and cannot be interfered within writ jurisdiction.[60]

(as) Religious Endowments

There is no presumption either way whether a temple is a public or private temple. It is a question of fact depending upon the circumstances such as course of conduct of the devotees, public visiting the temple, extent of the properties etc.[61]

Where an order of remand by a civil court does not mention the provision of law, the presumption is that it is passed under O. 41, R. 23, C.P.C.[62]

Where a foreign ex parte decree was passed against a domicile resident in India, and there was observation in the decree that summons was duly served on him, it cannot be presumed from such observation that the defendant was physically present in that country on the date of suit when the summons was served since a defendant may be served even outside that country.[63]

Whenever a Legislature repeals a particular provision, the natural presumption is that such a repeal must have been with a particular intention.[64]

The court presumes, unless contrary is shown, that the arbitrator has by his award determined only those matters that were referred to him.[65]

Where a judgement contains references only to some of the witnesses, it cannot be presumed that the court was unmindful of other evidence.[66]

(at) Education

Where a candidate appearing at the High School Examination in mathematics did not give the detailed calculation work in solving the sums, though the answers were correct, presumption about use of unfairmeans could not be drawn.[67] There can be no presumption on the ground of very good marks obtained in an examination that he/she will be entitled to get very good marks in the subsequent examination.[68]

(au) Cultivation underneath electric line

Having regard to common course of natural events, the Court can draw a presumption that agricultural operation in a reasonably profitable manner can be carried on in the affected land underneath electric lines except growing tall trees.[69]

(av) Inconsistency in evidence

In a motor accident case, it was held that no adverse inference could be drawn against the two injured minor girls due to some inconsistency in their testimony without following the procedure contemplated under Section 118 of the Evidence Act.[70]

(aw) Sufficiency of cause

No presumption can be drawn that there must be sufficient cause for delay for the condonation of which the party must place before the Court the acts constituting sufficient cause.[71]

(ax) Confirmation of minutes

Confirmation of the minutes of the meeting of the Corporators in the subsequent meeting is not obligatory under the Bombay Provincial Municipal Corporation Act, 1949. If the President signs over it, it can be given presumptive value which is rebuttable.[72]

Presumption as to absence of consent in certain prosecutions for rape

[74][S. 114-A. In a prosecution for rape under Cl. (a) or Cl. (b) or Cl. (c) or Cl. (d) or Cl. (e) or Cl. (g) of sub-section (2) of Section 376 of the Indian Penal Code (45 of 1860), where sexual intercourse by the accused is proved and the question is whether it was without the consent of the woman alleged to have been raped and she states in her evidence before the Court that she did not consent, the Court shall presume that she did not consent.]

COMMENTS

In a case on the subject before the Madhya Pradesh High Court, the prosecutrix stated in her evidence that she did not consent to the sexual intercourse. The Court accordingly held that by virtue of this section, the burden of proving consent shifted to the accused. The section comes into play on proof by the prosecution that sexual intercourse had, in fact, taken place and on the victim girl saying before the court that there was no consent on her part.[75] The Court cited the decision of the Supreme Court in Rafiq v. State of U.P.,[76] to the effect that the absence of marks of injury on the accused is not fatal in each case, nor does the absence of such physical injuries on the prosecutrix warrant the presumption of consent on her part.

It has been held that the presumption under S. 114-A is attracted only to cases that fall under S. 376(2), I.P.C. and not to cases that fall under S. 376(1), I.P.C.[77] Where in a case of gang rape there was unexplained delay of nine days in lodging the complaint, the victim was desirous to marry one of the accused, the victim unwillingly made the report under the pressure of her parents and the unexhibited report of the chemical examiner contra-indicated story of sexual intercourse, it was held that presumption under S. 114-A was not attracted.[78] It has been held that the absence of injuries on the person of the accused or the prosecutrix, the victim of rape, is not per se sufficient to indicate her consent.[79]

The statement of the prosecutrix in a rape case does not require corroboration to be acted upon.[80]

CHAPTER VIII

ESTOPPEL

Estoppel

S. 115. When one person has, by his declaration, act or omission, intentionally caused or permitted another person to believe a thing to be true and to act upon such belief, neither he nor his representative shall be allowed, in any suit or proceeding between himself and such person or his representative, to deny the truth of that thing.

ILLUSTRATION

A intentionally and falsely leads B to believe that certain land belongs to A, and thereby induces B to buy and pay for it.

The land afterwards becomes the property of A, and A seeks to set aside the sale on the ground that, at the time of the sale, he had no title. He must not be allowed to prove his want of title.

COMMENTS

1. PRINCIPLE AND SCOPE

Estoppel is based on the principle that it would be most inequitable and unjust that if one person, by a representation made, or by conduct amounting to a representation, had induced another to act as he would not otherwise have done, the person who made the representation should not be allowed to deny or repudiate the effect of his former statement, to the loss and injury of the person who acted on it.[1]

The section says that when one person has by his (a) declaration, (b) act, or (c) omission intentionally caused or permitted a person :

(i) to believe a thing to be true, and (ii) to act upon such belief, then neither he nor his representative shall be allowed to deny the truth of that thing in any suit or proceeding between himself and such person or his representative. To invoke the doctrine of estoppel three conditions must be satisfied: (1) representation by a person to another, (2) the other shall have acted upon the said representation, and (3) such action shall have been detrimental to the interests of the person to whom the representation has been made. Even where the first two conditions are satisfied but the third is not, there is no scope to invoke the doctrine of estoppel.[2]

The doctrine embodied in this section is not a rule of equity, but is a rule of evidence formulated and applied in courts of law.[3] It precludes a person from denying the truth of some statement previously made by himself. No casue of action arises upon estoppel itself.[4]

This section is based on equity and good conscience the object being to prevent fraud and secure justice between the parties by promoting honesty and good faith.[5] This section is based on the decision in Pickard v. Sears[6] in which it was stated—"Where a person by his words or conduct willfully causes another to believe in the existence of a certain state of things and induces him to act on that belief so as to alter his own previous position, the former is precluded from averring against the latter a different state of things as existing at the same time."[7]

The only difference is that in the above decision the expression "willfully" was used, whereas in this section the expression "intentionally" is used.

Practically there is no distinction between the law laid down in this section and the law in England.[8]

In HALSBURY (4th Ed, Vol. 16, para 1501, page 1008) it is observed : "Estoppel may be defined as a disability whereby a party is precluded from alleging or proving in legal proceedings, that a fact is otherwise than it has been made to appear by the matter giving rise to that disability."

The doctrine of estoppel has, however, been guarded with great strictness, not because the party enforcing it, is presumed to be desirous of excluding the truth... but because the estoppel may exclude the truth. Hence estoppels must be certain to every intent; for no one shall be prevented from setting up the truth, unless it be in plain contradiction to his former allegations and acts. These last words extend, not only to a man's own allegations and acts, but also to those of all persons through whom he claims; or, to express the same sentiment in the technical language of the law, estoppels are usually binding upon parties and privies. Lord coke has divided privies into three classes; first, privies in blood, as heirs; secondly, privies by estate, as feoffees, lessees, assignees, etc.; and thirdly, privies in law "as the Lord by escheat, the tenant by the courtesy, the tenant in dower, the incumbent of a benefice," husbands suing or defending in right of their wives, executors and administrators. In all these and the like cases, the law acting upon the wise principle quit sentit commodum, sentire debet et onus provides that the privy shall stand in no better position than the party through whom he derives his title; but that, if the latter is not at liberty to contradict what he has formerly said or done the former shall be subject to a like disability.[9]

To bring the case within the scope of estoppel as defined in Section 115: (1) there must be a representation by a person or his authorised agent to another in any form, a declaration, act or omission; (2) the representation must have been of the existence of a fact and not of promises de futuro or intention which might or might not be enforceable in contract; (3) the representation must have been meant to be relied upon; (4) there must have been belief on the part of the other party in its truth; (5) there must have been action on the faith of that declaration, act or omission, that is to say, the declaration, act or omission, must have actually caused another to act on the faith of it, and to alter his former position to his prejudice or detriment; (6) the misrepresentation or conduct or omission must have been the proximate cause of leading the other party to act to his prejudice; (7) the person claiming the benefit of an estoppel must show that he was not aware of the true state of things. If he was aware of the real state of affairs or had means of knowledge, there can be no estoppel; (8) only the person to whom representation was made or for whom it was designed can avail himself of it.[10]

Estoppel is a rule of civil action. It has no application to criminal proceedings, though in such proceedings it would be prejudicial to set up a different story.

A question of estoppel must be decided on ordinary common law principles of construction and of what is reasonable, without fine distinctions of technicalities. Estoppel is often described as a rule of evidence as indeed it may be so described. But, the whole concept is more carefully viewed as a rule of substantive law.[11]

The doctrine of estoppel by representation forms part of the English Law of evidence and such estoppel except as a bar to testimony, has no operation or efficacy whatsoever. Its sole object is either to place an obstacle in the way of a case which might otherwise succeed or to remove an impediment out of the way of the case which might otherwise fail.[12]

12. Ramniwas v. State, AIR 1970 Punj 462 (FB); Samarendra v. Calcutta University, AIR 1953 Cal 172. It cannot operate to create rights.

Estoppel by representation does not create interest in property except as provided in Section 43, T.P. Act.[13] VISHWANATHA SASTRY J. observed: "An estoppel though a branch of the law of evidence is also capable of being viewed as a substantive rule of law insofar as it helps to create or defeat rights which would not exist and be taken away but for that doctrine."[14]

Principle of estoppel cannot operate against a person who was not in existence at the date when the transaction took place.[15] Where the order of extension of service of an employee was cancelled before it became operative, the question of estoppel did not arise.[16]

The rule of estoppel must prevail over a pure rule of procedure contained in Section 92 of the Evidence Act.[17]

At times even an innocent or mistaken representation may operate as an estoppel.[18]

In a partition between joint purchasers of property where exclusive ownership of passage was given to the plaintiff under an unregistered deed of partition, the plaintiff filed a suit for declaration of his ownership to the passage basing on the partition deed. It was held that onwership of passage can only be granted if legal and admissible evidence is adduced to establish the right to property and it cannot be created by estoppel.[19] Section 115 deals with questions of facts and not of rights. No one can be estopped from asserting his right, which he might have stated that he will not assert.[20]

2. APPLICABILITY

When the Court is objectively satisfied that equity demands that the promisor can be allowed to resile from his/its promise or representation and the promise can be adequately compensated, the Court can decline to extend the applicability of the doctrine of promissory estoppel, whereas on the other hand if the Court is objectively satisfied that it cannot be made possible to relegate the promise to its original position ante, then the promise so made should be declared final and irrevocable ignoring the plea of executive necessity.[21] The principle of promissory estoppel is applicable to administrative law and not between the private parties.[22] A plea of estoppel can be raised in writ petitions.[23] Election petition cannot be disposed of summarily on the question of estoppel.[24]

3. NOT EXHAUSTIVE

The sections relating to estoppel in the Evidence Act are not exhaustive. Cases of estoppel may arise which are not within the purview of these sections.[25] As to other instances of estoppel, see S. 234 of the Indian Contract Act, 1872; S. 18 of the Specific Relief Act, 1877; Ss. 41 and 43 of the Transfer of Property Act, 1882; Ss. 27 and 53 of the Indian Sale of Goods Act, 1930; and S. 28 of the Indian Partnership Act, 1932.

4. CONSTRUCTIVE ESTOPPEL

This is no such thing known to the law as constructive estoppel.[26]

5. ESTOPPEL AND PRESUMPTION

Estoppel differs from presumption. An estoppel is a personal disqualification laid upon a person peculiary circumstances from proving peculiar facts, whereas a presumption is a rule that particular inferences shall be drawn from particular facts, whoever proves them.[27]

6. ESTOPPEL AGAINST ESTOPPEL

The maxim is 'estoppel against an estoppel setteth the matter at large'. In a case of one estoppel against another, the parties are set free and the court has to see what their original rights really are.[28]

7. FEEDING THE ESTOPPEL

"Feeding the estoppel" is an expression which is part of English Law of Estoppel and by it is meant that where a grantor has purported to grant interest in land which he did not at the time posses, but subsequently acquires, the benefit of subsequent acquisition goes automatically to the earlier grantee.[29]

The equitable principle of feeding the estoppel has been recognised to some extent in S. 43 of the Transfer of Property Act, 1882, which says that where a person fraudulently or erroneously represents that he is authorised to transfer certain immovable property and professes to transfer such property for consideration, such transfer shall, at the option of the transferee, operate on any interest which the transferor may acquire in such property at any time during which the contract of transfer subsists. But the right of transferees in good faith for consideration without notice of the existence of the said option shall not be impaired. In such cases the subsequent interest enduring to the benefit of the transferor is said to feed the estoppel which is subsisting in the transferee so as to preclude the transferor from contending that the transferee has no right to his subsequently acquired property.[29] The option to be exercised in Section 43 of the T.P.A. by the transferee is not required to be exercised in express term or in a particular form and can be implied from the very fact that he has been claiming his right over the entire property and that he was proceeding against not only the transferor but also the so-called subsequent transferees.[30] This principle applies in the case of sale, mortgage, lease, or any such grant.[31]

Estoppel by representation does not create interest in property except as provided in Section 43 Transfer of Property Act.[32] Where a person transfers property in which he had no right to transfer without making any representation that he had authority to transfer, Section 43 T.P. Act would not apply. Similarly when both parties know the truth it would not apply.[33] To entitle a transferee, to the benefit of Section 43 there must be a fraudulent or erroneous representation by the transferor that he is authorised to transfer the property which he professes to transfer and the transfer must be for consideration. There is no further requirement that the transferee must have acted in ignorance of the facts and must have believed in the truth of the representation by the transfer. In view of this, Section 43 does not require that the transferee should have made an independent enquiry or taken reasonable care to ascertain whether the transferor had power to transfer the property before claiming the benefit of the section.[34]

8. SECTION 41, T.P. ACT

Section 41, T.P. Act is similar in principle to Section 115. When an owner transfers property with apparent ownership and right of disposition thereof, he would be estopped from claiming title against a person to whom his original transferee disposed of the property and who took it in good faith and for consideration.[35] Principles of equity on which Section 41 of the T.P. Act, and Section 115 of the Evidence Act are based apply also to court sales.[36] Consent of the real owner need not be given to transfer. If it is proved by the transferee after taking requisite care to ascertain that the transferor had power to make transfer and he acted in good faith, he would be protected.[37]

Section 41, T.P. Act would not apply when the transferee had not taken care to ascertain the transferor's title and where the ostensible owner was not in possession with the consent of the real owner.[38] Section 41, T.P. Act would not apply to a transfer prohibited by any statute.[39]

Though the rule under Section 53-A, T.P. Act creates no right, it creates right of estoppel between the transferor and the transferee, which have no operation against third persons not claiming under those persons.[40] Reference may be made to commentory on Section 53-A of T.P. Act in Mulla's Transfer of Property Act and other standard treatises on that Act.

9. PERSON

The term 'person' applies only to a person of full age and competent to enter into contracts. If an infant represents fraudulently or otherwise that he is of age and thereby induces another to enter into a contract with him, the infant is not estopped from setting up infancy in an action founded on the contract.[41] But the court has discretion in equity to direct the minor to return the benefit he has received by false representation to the person he has deceived.[42] The Allahabad High Court has held that upon equitable grounds he may be made liable for any loss which the plaintiff has suffered.[43]

The Privy Council has not decided the point though the Calcutta High Court in its decision has expressly decided it.[44]

Under the English law a minor is not estopped from pleading his minority. An infant by fraudulently representing that he was of full age induced the plaintiffs to lend him a sum of money. In an action by the plaintiffs to recover the money it was held that the cause of action was in substance ex contractu, that the plea of infancy was a good answer to the action, and that the defendant was under no equitable liability to the plaintiffs.[45] When an infant obtained an advantage by falsely stating himself to be of full age, equity required him to restore him ill-gotten gains, or to release the party deceived from obligations or acts in law induced by the fraud, but scrupulously stopped short of enforcing against him a contractual obligation, entered into while he was an infant, even by means of fraud.[46] This case has been approved by the Privy Council.[47]

10. ESTOPPEL BY CONDUCT—DECLARATION, ACT OR OMISSION

All the three can be clubbed together under the expression "Conduct" and may be considered under the head "Representation by Conduct".

When a person has by his declaration, act or omission, intentionally caused or permitted another person to believe a thing to be true and to act upon such belief neither he nor his representative shall be allowed, in any suit, or proceeding between himself and such person or his representative to deny the truth of that thing. This is estoppel by conduct.[48]

To raise an estoppel by conduct, a person must by word or conduct induce another to believe that a certain state of things exists, and to cause that other to act on that belief in a way he would not have done had he known the facts, so that, if, in an action between them, the person making a representation were allowed to prove the true facts —to tell the truth—the other person would have been prejudiced. If these two conditions are fulfilled, then the person making the representation will not be allowed to deny its truth in any action between him and the person to whom he made it or the persons who claim in the same right But in any other action he can deny its truth. The ways in which a person may make such a representation are infinite. He may speak or write, act or omit to act, or act negligently.

The following are the recognised propositions of an estoppel by conduct:

(1) If a man by his words or conduct wilfully endeavours to cause another to believe in a certain state of things, which the first knows to be false, and if the second believes in such state of things, and acts upon his belief, he who knowingly made the false statements is estopped from averring afterwards that such a state of things did not, in fact, exist.

(2) If a man, either in express terms or by conduct, makes a representation to another of the existence of a certain state of facts which he intended to be acted upon in a certain way, and it be acted upon in that way, in the belief of the existence of such a state of facts, to the damage of him who so believes and acts, the first is estopped from denying the existence of such state of facts.

(3) If a man, whatever his real meaning may be, so conducts himself that a reasonable man would take his conduct to mean a certain representation of facts, and that it was a true representation, and that the latter was intended to act upon it in a particular way, and he, with such belief, does act in that way to his damage, the first is estopped from denying that the facts were as represented.

(4) If, in the transaction itself which is in dispute, one has led another into the belief of a certain state of facts, by conduct of culpable negligence calculated to have that result, and such culpable negligence has been the pomixate cause of leading and has led the other to act by mistake upon such belief, to his prejudice, the second cannot be heard afterwards, as against the first, to show that the state of facts referred to did not exist.[49]

Estoppel by conduct is distinguished from estoppel by record which constitutes the bar of res judicata. Even if the principle of res judicata is not applicable, the party can rely on estoppel by conduct.[50] Estoppel by conduct is of the very essence of the rules of estoppel embodied in Sections 115, 116 and 117 of the Evidence Act. The acts of the parties which come in for consideration in a litigation, must necessarily be acts performed prior to the commencement of the litigation.[51]

When a person has by his declaration, act or omission intentionally caused or permitted another person to believe a thing to be true and to act upon such belief neither he nor his representative shall be allowed, in any suit, or proceeding between himself and such person or his representative to deny the truth of that thing. This is estoppel by conduct.[52] Where the owner of the property clothes a third person with apparent ownership of property and right of disposition thereof and the third party disposes of that property, the real owner is estopped from asserting his title against the transferee in good faith and for value.[53] Where a mother was appointed by the court as guardian of the minor daughters on the basis of a statement by the mother that she would not claim interest in the property adverse to the daughters, she is estopped from filing a suit for possession of property on the basis of her title in respect of the son's property.[54] Where the grant in favour of the highest bidder in an auction was cancelled, and a second auction was held, in which the previous highest bidder participated, he is estopped from questioning the validity of the cancellation of the earlier auction in his favour.[55]

Estoppel by conduct is on the same footing as estoppel by representation.[56] The party against whom estoppel is pleaded should have made some representation intended to induce a course of conduct by the party to whom it is made.[57] Where a non-transferable holding is sold by a tenant by a Kobala, he is estopped from setting up the invalidity of the sale by him.[58]

The form of representation may be oral or written.[59] Admissions in affidavits filed by the Government which are mere expression of opinion limited to the context and not specific assurance, are not binding on the Government to create any estoppel.[60] Decree holder A himself asked the executing court to secure permission of competent authority for sale of property since judgement debtor B belonged to Scheduled Tribe. It was held that A could not be permitted to dispute that B did not belong to Scheduled Tribe and therefore permission of competent authority was not needed.[61] Where the defendants had been receiving deficit grant from the Government on the representation that a certain amount had to be paid on account of house rent for the school building, it hardly lies in the mouth of the defendants to assert that there is no liability to pay rent for the school building.[62]

Where there was provision for automatic absorption of the employees to S-3 pay scale but an employee insisted for his absorption to the higher pay scale of S-4, hence he was kept out of the scheme of absorption to which he made no objection and enjoyed certain benefits out of his exclusion, an inference could be drawn that by his conduct he had "opted out" of the scheme and was estopped to insist for absorption subsequently.[63] In a case an industrial unit was seized and sold by a Corporation under the A.P. State Financial Corporation Act. The respondent industrial unit raised the plea of absence of notice and opportunity and non-communication of the Corporation's decision for the first time in the writ petition before the H.C. Whereas after the sale, a certificate was issued by a Bank on the request of the respondent regarding its loan amount outstanding to the Bank. The said certificate made it clear that it wanted that the balance amount remaining after adjusting the dues to the Corporation should go in the discharge of its dues to the Bank and the Corporation paid the amount covered by the certificate to the Bank out of the balance of sale proceeds. It was held that the respondent's conduct estopped it from questioning the sale.[64] In a case an employee, having been convicted under the I.P.C. was removed from service. After undergoing imprisonment he appealed to the appellate authority which reduced his punishment of removal from service to lower pay scale, denying back wages which he accepted and joined duty. He was estopped subsequently from filing a suit for declaration that his removal from service, reduction in rank and denial of back wages was illegal.[65] In a proceeding challenging the grant of stage-carriage permit, the party failed to raise the ground of improper constitution of State Transport Authority before the tribunal, she was debarred by her conduct to raise it in the writ petition.[66] Where in a case of ex parte order of eviction against the tenant, the tenant applied under Section 144, C.P.C. for restoration of possession which having been allowed, he applied for an order for payment of compensation under the same section for the period of dispossession, it was held that the tenant could have included the claim for compensation in the application for restitution itself, he could not apply afresh as he was estopped by his own conduct. He could not vex a man twice for the same cause of action.[67] Where the Govt. granted affiliation to a college for a certain period and the college accepted the benefit, it could not subsequently raise objection against the said grant.[68] Where a party willingly and voluntarily entered into a mining contract within time limit of six months and worked and derived benefits thereunder, it cannot turn round and say that the said contract enured for twenty years as per Rules.[69] Where in a sale of land by a muslim father, his son himself attested the sale-deed without any objection though it was against his interest, he was estopped from challenging the sale subsequently.[70]

Under the Assam Panchayat Act (XXIV of 1959), Section 3(1) and (2), a Gaon Sabha created by State Government recommended creation of another Gaon Sabha out of its area. The Gaon Sabha was held estopped from challenging the creation thereof by the State Government.[71]

High Court would be loathesome to exercise its discretionary power to interfere at the instance of a party whose conduct is not free from blemish or who has either acquiesced or been a privy to the mischief sought to be remedied.[72]

Under the ordinary law of master and servant, once an employer has condoned any misconduct attributed to an employee, which would have otherwise justified his dismissal or punishment, the employer cannot after such condonation go back upon his election to condone and assert a right to punish the servant. This principle however does not apply where an employee is governed by statutory rules, and under the law, the employer is required to consider the case of an employee for promotion against whom a preliminary enquiry is pending. The promotion so made would not amount to condonation of misconduct which is the subject-matter of inquiry.[73] Where the petitioner himself participated in the election of the Assembly Speaker and thereafter took part in the Assembly proceedings for about six months, he was estopped to challenge the said election.[74] Where the last date for filing nomination papers was altered to a later date and the petitioners filed their nomination papers after the original date and contested the election but were unsuccessful, they cannot, turn round and contend that those who filed their nomination papers after the original date had no right to contest the election.[75]

Statement at the time of mutation could not be regarded as a case of reliquishment of ones rights. Nor could the person be estopped by his conduct from putting forward any legal plea questioning the mutation.[76] When an appeal was filed against direction for payment of decretal amount in instalments in money suit without filing a copy of decree and was withdrawn immediately after filing a subsequent appeal against decree on merits, it was held to be not barred due to earlier appeal, as the appellant was not estopped by conduct from filing the subsequent appeal. See Civil P.C. (1908) S. 2(2)[77]

11. DECLARATION—RECITAL IN A DEED

A recital in a deed or other instrument is in some cases conclusive, and in all cases evidence as against the parties who make it, and it is of more or less weight or more or less conclusive against them according to circumstances. It is a statement deliberately made by those parties, which, like any other statement, is always evidence against the persons who make it. But it is no more evidence as against third persons than any other statement would be.[78] A recital in a deed or other instrument is in some cases evidence against the party who makes it to attract estoppel but it is not evidence against other persons.[79] Where a deed describes that the land was of a particular category and the parties dealt with on that basis, it is not open to the parties to resile from that position.[80] Where the executant mentioned in the document that he was the sole owner of the property and that he was entitled to execute the document, it is not open to him to resile from the document and say that he was not entitled to execute the same.[81] Sale deed of abadi site contained an stipulation that the vendor was not responsible for obtaining consent of the landlord to the transfer and that vendee was responsible for the same. The stipulation did not in any way amount to an admission that the site was not liable to be sold without the consent of the landlord or that he had a right to recover possession of the site and that the vendee was not estopped from asserting his ownership to abadi site.[82] Under the Bengal Tenancy Act as well as the Kobala under which a stranger purchased the holding, it was described as an occupancy holding. The occupying tenant sought pre-emption of land. It was held that the purchaser was estopped from challenging the right to pre-emption of the occupancy tenant.[83]

Where the recital in a deed is intended to be a statement which all the parties to the deed have mutually agreed to admit as true, it is an estoppel upon all. But where it is intended to be a statement of one party only the estoppel is confined to that party—when in a deed of sale, the vendors make unilateral statement that the vendors are potinamdars of the property transferred, the vendees are not bound by it and they are not estopped from denying that fact.[84] Where the vendor receives consideration and delivers possession of property without executing the sale deed, he is estopped from repudiating the fiduciary obligation arising out of contract after a long lapse of time.[85] Where a person settles a residential colony on his land and sells plots on the representation that a certain land marked as park in the plan would be used as such by them, he is estopped from claiming the land subsequently as his private land.[86]

Maps annexed to a sale deed ought not to be deemed part of deeds.[87]

12. FUTURE PROMISE

To create an estoppel there must be a representation by means of a declaration, act or omission that a thing is true, i.e., that the representation is as to some state of facts alleged to be at the time actually in existence. If the representation relates to a promise de futuro, it can be binding not as an estoppel but as a contract.[88] A mere promise to do something in future will not create an estoppel.[89] There is a clear distinction between a representation of an existing fact and a representation that something will be done in future. The former may, if it amounts to a representation as to some fact alleged at the time to be actually in existence, raise an estoppel, if another person alters his position relying upon that representation. A representation that something will be done in the future may result in a contract if another person to whom it is addressed acts upon it.[90] Under Section 115 estoppel could be created not merely by an act or omission but also by declaration or representation which must necessarily be of existing fact, not of promise to do something in future which might or might not be enforceable in contract.[91]

Where an employee on termination of his service passes a receipt saying that he had no further claim against his employer and it is found that the receipt was executed without reference to bonus which was not, and could not even then have been, in the contemplation of both parties it does not constitute an estoppel against the employee's subsequent demand for the bonus declared afterwards in respect of the period during which he was in service.[92]

13. INTENTIONALLY CAUSES OR PERMITS

A person who, by his declaration, act or omission, had caused another to believe a thing to be true and to act upon that belief, must be held to have done so 'intentionally' if a reasonable man would take the representation to be true, and believe that it was meant that he should act upon it.[93] At times even an innocent or mistaken representation may operate as an estoppel.[94]

It is not essential that the person making the representation which induces another to act must be influenced by a fraudulent intention. A fraudulent intention is not necessary to create an estoppel. The determining element is not the motive with which the representation has been made, nor the state of knowledge of the party making it, but the effect of the representation as having caused another to act on the faith of it.[95] The Allahabad High Court has held that the word intentionally does not mean that the conduct of the person making the representation should have been fraudulent or that it should not have been made under a mistake or misapprehension. The motive or state of knowledge of the representor is immaterial. The law only considers the position of the person to whom the representation was made.[96] The section "does not make it a condition of estoppel resulting that the person who by his declaration or act had induced the belief on which another has acted was either committing or seeking to commit a fraud, or that he was acting with a full knowledge of the circumstances, and under no mistake or misapprehension...What the law and the Indian statute mainly regard is the position of the person who was induced to act; and the principle on which the law and the statute rest is, that it would be most inequitable and unjust to him that if another, by a representation made, or by conduct amounting to a representation, has induced him to act as he would not otherwise have done, the person who made the representation should be allowed to deny or repudiate the effect of his former statement, to the loss or injury of the person who acted on it." If the person who made the statement did so without full knowledge, or under error, it may, in the result, be unfortunate for him, but it would be unjust, even though he acted under error, to throw the consequences on the person who believed his statement and acted on it as it was intended he should do.[97]

"An estoppel does not in itself give a cause of action; it prevents a person from denying a certain state of facts. One ground of estoppel is where a man makes a fraudulent misrepresentation and another man acts upon it to his detriment. Another may be where a man makes a false statement negligently, though without fraud, and another person acts upon it. And there may be circumstances under which, where a misrepresentation is made without fraud and without negligence, there may be an estoppel."[98] There may be statements made, which have induced another party to do that from which otherwise he would have abstained, which cannot properly be characterised as misrepresentation, but which amount to estoppel.[99]

The word 'caused...person to believe a thing to be true' refer to the belief in a fact and not in proposition of law.[1] "Believe a thing to be true", i.e., believe a fact to be true. The word 'thing' means fact.[2] It must be found that the defendant by his act or omission intentionally caused or permitted another person to believe a thing to be true and to act upon such belief. It is not sufficient to say that it may well be doubted whether the plaintiff would have acted in the way he did but for the way in which the defendant had acted. It must be found that the plaintiff would not have acted as he did.[3] If a man, either by words or by conduct has intimated that he consents to an act which has been done, and that he will offer no opposition to it, although it could not have been lawfully done without his consent and he thereby induces others to do that from which they otherwise might have abstained, he cannot question the legality of the act he had so sanctioned, to the prejudice of those who have so given faith to his words, or to the fair inference to be drawn from his conduct.[4] The petitioner represented that he wanted to hold ice shows for a limited duration. The first round of shows in the various cities of India was over. The Reserve Bank was not estopped from refusing further permission. There was no representation that they would be permitted till their foreign exchange was exhausted.[5]

14. NO ESTOPPEL WHEN THE OTHER PERSON KNOWS THE REAL FACTS

The section does not apply to a case where the statement relied upon is made to a person who knows the real facts and is not misled by the untrue statement. There can be no estopped where the truth of the matter is known to both parties.[6] Where the defendant knew that the buildings in dispute did not belong to him, but had been sold to the plaintiff, and, in spite of that fact, he chose of his own accord to incur expenditure by repairing these buildings, it was held that he could not raise any plea of estoppel.[7] A party relying upon this section has to establish not only that the opposite party had made a ertain declaration, but that the said declaration had been believed and had been acted upon and that it was not reasonably possible for the said party to know the true state of affairs by pursuing inquiries reasonably and with diligence. Where truth is accessible to a party, the plea of estoppel upon representation fails.[8] If a person is aware of the state of affairs or had means of knowledge there can be no estoppel.[9] Where a person makes a representation in a mistaken view of a fact and the person to whom such representation is made, knows the true state of facts, there is no estoppel. The person having knowledge of facts cannot take advantage of the principle of estoppel.[10]

If both sides have laboured under mistake, however bona fide or genuine it may be, the plea of estoppel is not available. Where, however, the mistake is within the knowledge of only one of the parties and the other on the basis representation acts and shifts his position to his prejudice, estoppel is certainly available.[11] No question of estoppel can ever arise where both the parties are labouring under a mistake of law.[12] When both parties were under a common error as per the erroneous advice of the lawyers in regard to the construction of a Will, and not by the representation of the beneficiary under the Will, the beneficiary was not estopped from claiming under the Will.[13]

15. AND TO ACT UPON SUCH BELIEF

A person cannot invoke the doctrine of estoppel unless he proves that he has been induced to change his position to his detriment by relying upon any declaration, act or omission of the person against whom the doctrine is invoked.[14] The person setting up an estoppel against another must show that his position was altered by reason of the representation or conduct of the latter, otherwise even the general principle of estoppel cannot be invoked by him.[15] Estoppel can arise only if a party to a proceeding has altered his position on the faith of a representation or promise made by another.[16]

Where on the basis of promise of grant of loan by certain financial institutions, an entrepreneur invested a huge amount from the sanctioned loan and the private resources in constructing an hotel complex but payment of the balance of the promised loan was stopped before the construction was completed, the principle of promissory estoppel was attracted as the entrepreneur had altered his position to his disadvantage.[17] Where on the basis of assurances and promises given by the State Govt. under its scheme, the entrepreneur set the cement factory and took other necessary steps, the Govt. cannot go back on their assurances and promises.[18] Where the Govt. under a scheme promised to grant subsidy to the industrial units in industrially backward areas on investment in goods-carriage and the petitioner in persuance of that scheme purchased goods-carriage for transport of its goods when the said scheme was in force, the Govt. was estopped subsequently to withdraw the subsidy with retrospective effect.[19] Where the Municipal Board communicated its offer for the allotment of a plot to the petitioner who deposited a large sum of money with the Board and spent money for obtaining water and electrical connections and construction was put up on the said plot as per plan sanctioned by the Board, the Board could not be allowed to resile from its promise and it was directed to execute a registered patta (lease) in favour of the petitioner.[20]

A person who has not suffered detriment by acting upon the representation of the other parties cannot invoke the doctrine of estoppel.[21] Where there is no evidence of any detriment to the appellants as a consequence of the silence of the respondents or altering of their position in any way and there was no conduct amounting to representation intended to induce a cause of conduct on the part of the appellants, there is no question of estoppel.[22]

Credit given in a pass-book binds the banker, if on the faith of such credit the customer has altered his position, as by drawing on the credit, etc., for by entering the sums to the customer's credit, they lead him to suppose that they have received them on his account. When, however, there has been no such alteration, the banker is allowed to show that the entries were made by mistake; for the pass-book is only prima facie evidence against him.[23]

In 1906 the Government of Bombay compulsorily acquired certain land belonging to the defendant, and as a result of proceedings under the Land Acquisition Act paid to the defendant in 1912 the amount of compensation awarded by the High Court. In 1924, Government, discovering that the land was of their ownership, sued to recover the money from the defendant, as money paid to him under a mistake. It was held that they were estopped in view of the position taken up by them in the land acquisition proceedings and the consequent alteration in the position of the defendant.[24]

16. REPRESENTATION MUST BE CLEAR AND UNAMBIGUOUS

The representation which is the basis for the rule must be clear and unambiguous and not indefinite, upon which the party relying on it, is said to have, in good faith and in belief of it, acted.[25] To create an estoppel against a party his declaration, act or omission must be of an unequivocal and unambiguous character[26]. An estoppel to have any judicial value, must be clear and non-ambiguous; it must also be free, voluntary and without any artifice.[27]

Where there is no representation, principle of estoppel would not apply.[28]

17. ESTOPPEL BY SILENCE OR ACQUIESCENCE

Whenever there is a duty owing by one person towards another to speak or act which he has failed to perform and the other party has been led by such silence to change his position, such silence would operate as estoppel against the former. But where there is no duty to speak, no estoppel can arise.[29]

When silence is of such a character and under such circumstances that it would be fraud upon the other party, for the party which has kept silence to deny what his silence has induced, it will operate as an estoppel.[30] A man is bound to speak out in certain cases, and his very silence becomes an expression as if he has openly consented to what is said or done and had become a party to the transaction. The ostensible owner sold certain land and his son, the real owner, remained silent. The acquiescence resulted in an estoppel.[31] A mortgagee who caused the mortgaged property to be sold in execution of a decree other than decree obtained upon his mortgage, without notifying to intending purchasers the existence of his mortgage line, was held to be estopped for ever from setting up that lien against the title of a bona fide purchaser[32] and so is estopped the party claiming possession on a land over which he, despite his knowledge, allowed the construction of a factory by the opposite party without making any objection.[33] A positive or active declaration as also an act or omission can constitute the basis for a plea of estoppel. An estoppel may arise from silence as well as words. However, to constitute an 'estoppel by silence' or 'acquiescence' it must appear that the party to be estopped must be bound in equity and good conscience to speak and that party claiming estoppel relied upon such silence or acquiescence and was misled thereby to change his position to his prejudice. Where a company allowed the other company, a sister concern, to manufacture the same products under the same registered trade mark for a long period, the doctrine of acquiescence and honest and concurrent user was attracted.[34] The students acted upon to their detriment when they continued their studies in the colleges in the belief that their admissions had been approved by the University and the University is estopped by keeping silence when it did not reject their admission at an early stage.[35] On the facts, the director of the company who was a party to the resolution allotting the shares in order to comply with the requirements of Section 277(1) of the Companies Act, dealt with the shares on the footing that allottees were the holders of the shares with a clear knowledge of the circumstances on which he might have founded his present objection. He cannot be heard to say, that he was interested in the allotment and could not vote. He would be estopped from contending the allotment is invalid.[36] Appellant questioned validity of certain rules. Appellant acquiesced to the rules by applying for the post of Village Accountant and took chance on being elected. Constitutionality of rules cannot be questioned by him.[37] A party who acquiesces to arbitration proceedings by participating in it for a long time, cannot be permitted to contend that the matter is legally incapable of being referred to arbitration.[38] Where the landlord has admitted the sub-tenancy for four years with his knowledge and the rent has been paid by the sub-tenant in the presence of the landlord and on several occasions passed on to him by the tenant, a presumption of acquiescence will be strengthened by the fact that the landlord offered no explanation why he had waited for four years before filing the suit for ejectment on the ground of illegal sub-letting.[39] The petitioner participated in the election of the managing committee of a school. The managing committee, after it was constituted, selected another as Headmaster. The petitioner is esttoped from challenging the appointment on the ground that the committee was not properly constituted as he had acquiesced in the election of the committee.[40] The candidate, participating in the selection without objection, is estopped from challenging the constitution of the Selection Committee and the procedure adopted by it.[41] Participation by the landholders in the proceedings of land acquisition at successive stages would bring in estoppel against them to challenge it subsequently on the ground available to them earlier but had been waived by them.[42]

Absence of a specific plea in wife's reply to the notice of second husband to the effect that she was a minor at the time of divorce from her first husband, she is not estopped from raising that plea.[43] Mere inaction against an incorrect settlement entry is not such an act or omission, as will, without more, be sufficient in law to induce or mislead another person to act upon the same and so to act to his prejudice.[44] When no objection to the constitution of the R.T.A., on the ground of bias of one of its members was taken by the petitioner when the R.T.A. considered his renewal application, or when it decided the matter, it was held, that he was not estopped from raising this objection in an application under Arts. 226 and 227 of the Constitution.[45] Where seats were reserved for members of the scheduled caste and there was questioning of election on the ground that the elected candidate was not a member of a scheduled caste as he had ceased to be a Hindu and had become a Buddhist. Where there was failure to object at time of scrutiny of nomination papers, there can be no estoppel to raise an objection in election petition. But such failure would consideraly weaken the objection.[46] An excess of statutory power cannot be validated by acquiescence on or by the operation of an estoppel.[47] Illegal renewal of permit and acquiescing in its renewal over a long period of 29 years would not disentitle the authorities to object to its renewal subsequently.[48] The Development Authority does not acquiesce in illegal/unauthorised possession and is entitled to demolish the structure as soon as the interim injunction is vacated or modified.[49] Where the defendant gave evidence that when he came to know the user of his trademark by some other manufacturer, he could not ascertain his name, he did not acquiesce in the user of his trademark by the plaintiff.[50]

Where there was an omission to raise the plea of non-joinder of parties and it was not made subject-matter of an issue nor was it raised in grounds of appeal, it would operate as waiver.[51]

When on one party making a certain other claim, the dispute before the Arbitrator was unilaterally enlarged in spite of the objection by the opposite party who was left with no option but to participate in the proceedings, that did not amount to acquiescence.[52]

18. ACQUIESCENCE IN ILLEGAL OR IRREGULAR PROCEDURE

Question of mode of proof is a question of procedure and is capable of being waived and therefore evidence taken in a previous judicial proceeding can be made admissible in a subsequent proceedings by consent of parties. Relevant evidence can be brought on the record for consideration of the court or the Tribunal without following the regular mode, if parties agree.[53] Even after a person was exonerated by the Criminal Court, he was not given his substantive post, but another post temporarily and he had no other option but to work under the new conditions imposed on him as he could not afford to lose his Government service, the mere fact that he had to work in the new post for about seven days would not, in any way, create any estoppel against him.[54] The court can adopt a procedure to settle the disputes "extra curus curaie" provided the parties either consent or acquiesce in the said procedure. When once they consented they cannot turn round and question the proceeding adopted by the Court.[55]

Where a settlement is made outside conciliation proceeding between the employer and the majority union, acceptance of benefits following the settlement even by workmen who were not signatories to it, does not operate as estoppel against minority union raising same demands. Theory of implied agreement by a acquiescence is not attracted in such a case.[56] A breach of covenant in regard to the user of the premises in a continuing breach. If a landlord takes no exception to the changed user but acquisces in the breach, it would not constitute an irrevocable sanction to the changed user at a later period or for all time to come as there is no estoppel against the landlord.[57]

19. ACQUIESCENCE TO JURISDICTION

Consent cannot give jurisdiction.[58]

Where a Small Causes Court decided the suit, although the allegations in the plaint clearly excluded it from its jurisdiction, by Art. 35(ii) of Sch. II of Provisional Small Cause Court Act, it was held that the plaintiff was not estopped from challenging the court's jurisdiction, when the decision goes against him, as acquiescence cannot confer jurisdiction[59] but where the defendant pleaded that only the Small Causes Court had the jurisdiction to decide the suit for possession and not a Civil Court, the plaint was returned to the Small Causes Court, the defendant was estopped from raising the plea that the transferee Court had no jurisdiction.[60] Where the power to decide is delegated by the Commissioner to the Commercial Tax Officer and the assessee does not question, the same earlier, later he cannot challenge the power of the officer on the ground that the Commissioner could not validly delegate the power to the Commercial Tax Officer.[61] Where appellants submit to the jurisdiction of the High Court, they cannot take exception to such jurisdiction.[62] Party acquiescing in proceedings before umpire is precluded from challenging the award for lack of jurisdiction.[63] Where the applicant had not challenged the jurisdiction of the additional Magistrate, he cannot challenge it subsequently in his petition for certiorari. If he acquiesced in the jurisdiction in the hope of getting a favourable decision, the doctrine of estoppel should be applied against him.[64] Every Court or quasi-judicial authority has got inherent power to restore the case dismissed by it in default. In any view, the petitioners participated in the proceeding before the Board of Revenue after the restoration of the revision and took chance of success. Now, they could not be allowed to raise any objection as to the jurisdiction.[65] Where a person acquiesces and submits to the jurisdiction of a committee of or an enquiry officer without raising any objection he cannot be allowed to challenge the jurisdiction of the enquiry officer, subsequently in his writ petition.[66] A person who submits to the jurisdiction of an authority is estopped from challenging the jurisdiction thereof.[67]

An estoppel against a party cannot give the court jurisdiction where it has none.[68] There can be no estoppel against a statute and that consent cannot confer jurisdiction.[69]

When premises does not fall vacant the Rent Controller has no jurisdiction to make allotment, under U.P. Temporary Rent Control and Eviction Act, 1947. Allotment can be challenged by a purchaser even though he also had applied for allotment and had submitted to the jurisdiction. Application made in ignorance of his right does not estop him.[70] Where the custodian, under the Administration of Evacuee Property Act (1950), made an order without jurisdiction, petitioner consented to the order and did not take objection to the jurisdiction before the custodian, he is not prevented from challenging his order in writ petition.[71]

Objection regarding territorial jurisdiction does not go to the root of jurisdiction. A judgement debtor is estopped from taking that objection in execution as to the validity of the decree.[72]

Service of notice is a condition precedent for proceedings under Section 21 of U.P. Sales Tax Act. Where notice was served on an unconcerned person but the assessee participated in the proceedings; it was held that as service of notice is a condition precedent for proceeding under Section 21 of the U.P.

20. STANDINGBY

When A standsby while his right is being infringed by B, the rule of estoppel by acquiescence applies under the following conditions.

(1) B must be mistaken as to his legal rights;

(2) B must expend money or do some act on the faith of his mistaken belief;

(3) A must know his own rights;

(4) A must know of B's mistaken belief; and

(5) A must encourage B in his expenditure of money or other act directly or by abstaining from asserting his legal rights.[75]

To found a plea of estoppel on the doctrine of standingby, it must be affirmatively established that the parties against whom that estoppel is sought to be pleaded were aware of what was being done and consciously stoodby.[76] The limitation on the rule of standingby are that, first, the stranger building on the land must do so supposing it to be his own and secondly, the owner of the land, perceiving his mistake, abstains from setting him right and leaves him to persevere in his error.[77] In a suit for mandatory injunction directing demolition of construction put up by the defendant on suit land, it was held that the plaintiff could have known in time about the construction by the defendant on suit land, had he cared to find out. Principle of estoppel by acquiescence is applicable and the plaintiff was entitled only to a decree for compensation.[78] Where the tenant at will sold his rights together with house and tenure rights and the landlord perused the transfer deeds and recognised the transfer, and mutated the names of the transferees in his sherists, and when the transferee built a double storeyed pucca house on the land, the landlord did not object to the construction. The landlord is estopped from asserting any title to the land.[79]

Lord CRANWORTH observed: "If a stranger begins to build on my land supposing it to be his and I (the real owner) perceiving his mistake, abstain from setting him right, and leave him to persevere in his error, a court of equity will not allow me afterwards to assert my title to the land, on which he has expended money on the supposition that the land was his own. It considers that when I saw the mistake in which he had fallen, it was my duty to be active and to state his adverse title; and that it would dishonest in me to remain willfully passive on such an occasion in order afterwards to profit by the mistake which I might have prevented."[80]

JANKINS. J. commented: "The doctrine involved (In Ramden's case) is often treated as one of estoppel, but I doubt whether this is correct, though it may be convenient name to apply. It differs essentially from the doctrine embodied in Section 115, which is not a rule of equity, but is a rule of evidence.....I do not think that it is any objection to that enquiry that the interest the municipality was to have in the land was not originally moulded in a form recognised by the law; that does not prevent us from now imposing such terms as will prevent that which a court of equity would regard as a fraud."[81]

Where there is no mistaken belief as to ownership of the land, still less was any mistaken belief, known to the other side, there is no basis for the application of the equitable doctrine of estoppel.[82] Where a person in possession of land, not in mistaken belief of his rights but in assertion of his right which he correctly believed to be his, builds structure on the land and the person who is entitled to possession knows of this, the latter is not estopped by acquiescence, from bringing a suit for possession.[83]

Where the leasee holding a lease for a term of ten years with renewal clause, built house on the land leased without consent, the lessor is not estopped from taking Khas Possession of lease hold.[84] Where under an oral agreement to grant permanent lease, the defendant took possession and erected structures and the plaintiff encouraged him to do so, it was held that the defendant cannot rely on the doctrine of equitable estoppel by representation.[85]

21. NEGLIGENCE AND ESTOPPEL

In support of a plea of estoppel on the ground of negligence it must be shown that the party against whom the plea is raised owned a duty to the party who raises the plea, or towards the general public of which he is one and that the negligence on which it is based should not be directly or remotely connected with the misleading effect assigned to it but must be proximate or real cause of that result i.e., the negligence which can sustain a plea of estoppel must be in the transaction itself and it should be so connected with the result to which it led that that it is impossible to treat the two separately.[86] Estoppel depends on the existence of some duty; and that is peculiarly so in the case of an omission. In order to succeed on a plea of estoppel it must be shown that there was a neglect of some duty owing to the person led into a particular belief, or to the general public of whom that person is one, and not merely neglect of what would be prudent in respect of the party prejudiced, or even of some duty owing to third persons, with whom those seeking to set up estoppel are not privy. There is a breach of the duty if the party estopped has not used due precautions to aver the risk.[87] In order to create estoppel by negligence mere negligence on the part of the true owner is not enough. Negligence must be of so serious a character as to amount to a breach of duty by the owner to the party defrauded or to the general public of which the party defrauded is one.[88]

Where low amounts were collected as electric consumption charges, it was held that there is no estoppel as it was done by mistake in computation and it does not relieve the customer from his obligation to pay the true amount.[89] A banker is not estopped from claiming refund of excess credit given to the customers account.[90] In a suit for recovery of embezzled amount from bank on ground of plaintiff's forged signature and bank debited plaintiff's account on basis of cheques and advices, it was held that when a Bank was maintainging separate ledger for plaintiff's account and submitting regular statements of account coupled with confirmation slips which were returned duly signed by plaintiff, such confirmation amounted to acknowledgement and plaintiff would be estopped from challenging debits balance made due to his neglect.[91] A sold certain item of property (X) to B and later on executed a mortgage of his property which included that item (X) also. A then sold the mortgaged property to C. In a suit for redemption C raised plea of estoppel against B in allowing the item (X) to be included in the mortgage. C however, had admitted that he knew that B was in possession of the property but that he thought that B was in possession as a possessory mortgagee. He made no further enquiries and did not have a search made in office of the Sub-Registrar to ascertain if there was any other encumbrance regarding that item, or any other transaction evidenced by a registered document. It was held that C's omission in nor having made such enquiries must be held to be wilful, or as grossly negligent, and in that view he could not claim any right to redeem that item and was estopped by his omission and negligence.[1]

In HALSBURY 4th Edn., Vol. 16, Para: 1620: Page 1091, it observed: Before anyone can be estopped by a representation inferred from negligent conduct. The expression "estoppel by negligence" has been criticised as an inaccurate expression, in that estoppel arises from a representation by words or conduct: see Saunders[2] there must be a duty to use due care towards the party misled, or towards the general public of which he is a member (This does not mean that the onus is on the person misled to prove that the party he seeks to sue is estopped and owed a duty to him in the same way as is necessary in establishing the tort of negligence: see Saunders[3] A person who does not lock up his goods, which are consequently stolen, may be said to be negligent as regards himself, but inasmuch as he neglects no duty which the law casts upon him he is not in consequence estopped from denying the title of those who may have purchased those goods from the thief, unless it be in market overt.

Persons who issue documents with a certain mercantile meaning attached to them, for example, delivery orders, owe a duty to merchants and others likely to deal with those documents to use due care in their issue; and a railway undertaker or warehouseman issuing duplicate orders for the same goods may be estopped from denying that they had two parcels, to the prejudice of someone who has advanced money on the faith of the duplicate. Accordingly, if in the course of business a man volunteers a statement upon which another businessman may probably act, it is his duty to take reasonable care that the statement is correct.

If there is no duty cast upon the customer to scrutinise his bank passbook as soon as received and to inform the banker about any inaccuracies in the passbook it cannot result in estoppel.[4] Where forged cheques were paid by a Bank, the Bank is liable for wrong payment, plea of estoppel based on negligence of the customer is not available.[5] In a case specific instructions were issued by the customer to the bank guarantee in terms of the contract against mobilisation advance to be received from the beneficiaries; the bank negligently issued mobilisation advance-cum-performance guarantee. it was held that the beneficiary cannot invoke guarantee for recovery of loss or damage and the customer not being a party to the guarantee is not estopped from seeking court's protection.[6]

22. ESTOPPEL AGAINST REPRESENTATIVES

Estoppel applies not only in favour of the person induced to change his position but of a transferee from such person, and it binds not only the persons whose representations or actions have created it, but all persons claiming under or through them by gratuitous title.[7] A legal representative of a party to the record is as much bound by every estoppel as it is binding on his predecessor.[8] Admission by predecessor of defendant in a previous suit is binding on defendant in the present suit.[9]

23. PARTNER

Section 19 of Partnership Act (1932) does not give implied authority to partner to refer dispute to arbitration. When such a dispute is referred and other partners who know about it do not take any objection to the proceedings before the arbitrator till the passing of the award, it must be taken that they

24. TRUSTEE

A person who acted as a trustee of a public temple cannot later claim that as his private property.[12] The persons who are in possession of the property as trustees are estopped from denying the validity of the trust.[13]

Where a trustee had taken proceedings stating that a particular statute applies, the religious institution is not estopped from contending that it falls outside the purview of the statute.[14]

25. COMPANY

Where a director of a Banking Company dealt with the shares on the footing that the allottees were holders of the shares with a clear knowledge of the circumstance that he was interested in the particular transaction of the board meeting of the company, in a suit by the company against the allottees he was estopped from contending that the allotment was invalid; he could not be allowed to say that he was interested in the allotment and could not vote.[15] The share holders of a company requisitioned the Managing Director to convene a meeting for electing a new Managing Director. The meeting was not held at the registered office at the time fixed because the premises had been locked. Share-holders held the meeting at another place and passed a resolution removing the Managing Director and appointed another person as Managing Director. It was held that by reason of his conduct in not making the registered office available for the meeting, the Managing Director was precluded from complaining of the invalidity of the meeting actually held at a different place or the resolution passed there.[16] Directors of a company who participated at the Annual General Meeting and received with full knowledge of all facts, the dividents declared at that meeting, are estopped from challenging the validity of the said meeting and the proceeding thereof.[17] The plaintiff company allowed its Manager to use its seal for the purpose of endorsement of various cheques drawn in favour of the plaintiff company. The Manager encashed certain cheques but did not credit the amount in company's account. Plaintiff sued the Bank for damages on the ground that the Bank was guilty of negligence in giving away money to an unauthorised person. It was held, the plaintiff company by its conduct represented the Bank that the person encashing the cheque had authority to an act behalf of the plaintiff as its Manager and therefore, plaintiff company was estopped from challenging the authority of that person who used the company's seal as its manager.[18]

27. MINOR

It was held by the Privy Council that the infant will not be estopped from pleading his minority not withstanding his fraudulant representation.[21] But in an other case it was held that the infant will be estopped from taking advantage of his minority where there was misrepresentation and legal fraud played by the infant.[22]

The Privy Council held that any deed executed by a minor representing as a major is a nullity and the plea of estoppel will not operate.[23] Where the tenancy of a house occupied by a deceased tenant devolved jointly on his heirs two of whom were minor sons, it was held that the tenancy could not be terminated by the heirs accepting a new tenancy, as the question of acquiescence, waiver or estopel could not arise so far as the minors are concerned.[24]

In all the above cases the minor figured as defendant in the proceedings. In cases where the minor figures as plaintiff, the doctrine of estoppel would not apply. A minor can be a mortgagee or promisee or a vendee whereunder he advances money for the transactions entered into, in which cases it can be enforced by him or by any person on his behalf.[25]

A decree was passed against a minor who was not properly represented. The minor filed an appeal through his natural brother as guardian. Minor's guardian entered into a compromise on behalf of the minor and the appellate court modified the decree of the trial court in view of compromise. In the circumstances, it was held that the minor cannot question the validity of the appellate decree. Where a representation is made by a properly constituted guardian of the minor, the minor is bound by the representation.[26] An agreement made by the Karta of the Joint Hindu Family on behalf of the family is binding on the minor members also and they are estopped from challenging the same.[27] Where the defendant had recovered the properties in the suit from third parties after litigation prosecuted by him as the guardian of the plaintiff, he could not, be heard to plead that the decree in favour of his ward was illegal, and he was entitled to retain the property as reversioner.[28]

In a suit by a minor plaintiff through next friend for pre-emption, it was alleged that the plaintiff's mother, prior to sale in favour of the defendant, had represented that she had no intention to pre-empt sale. It was held that the plaintiff was entitled to pre-empt and that the previous consent of the plaintiff's mother would not operate as estoppel in view of the non-compliance with provisions of Section 173(3) Berar Land Revenue Code.[29]

28. JOINT FAMILY

Wife's succession is not affected by estoppel arising out of husband's action.[30]

Neither a reversioner nor person claiming through him can be estopped from challenging surrender by a widow, if it was void or voidable in law.[31]

Where the father takes benefit under a surrender by a widow and the son does not receive any benefit under it, the son is not estopped from challenging the surrender by the widow.[32]

29. MISCELLANEOUS

A person is not estopped from asserting his own title to a property which he did not claim in a previous suit wherein he, as a witness, had supported the defence.[33]

Where a union representing workers raised an industrial dispute challenging retrenchment of workers and the individual workmen accepted retrenchment benefits subsequently, the union is not estopped from challenging the retrenchment.[34]

Where a sale certificate is issued u/O 21, R. 94, C.P.C., stating that properties were sold subject to mortgage, purchaser is not precluded from contesting the binding nature of mortgage.[35]

30. ESTOPPEL AGAINST PERSON CLAIMING IN DIFFERENT CAPACITY

Acting in a representative character does not create estoppel on personal claims.[36] Where the suit is one on behalf of the community and the plaintiff does not claim any title or set up any personal right in him, no estoppel can be pleaded against him in his representative capacity by reason of any individual act, he might have committed.[37] A person transferred his import licence. The transferee imported the goods. The original licensee had committed irregularities in obtaining the licence, it was held that the transferee could not be made to suffer on that basis.[38]

31. ELECTION—APPROBATE AND REPROBATE

LORD ATKIN observed: "Where a person has the choice of two rights either of which he is at liberty to adopt, but not both, and if he adopts one, he cannot afterwards assert the other".[39]

LORD BLACKBURN quoting from COKE observed that when a man has an option to choose one or the other of two inconsistent things, when he has made his election, it cannot be retracted.[40]

In HALSBURY'S Laws of England 4th Edn., Vol. 16, para 1507, page. 1012, it is observed: "On the principle that a person may not approbate and reprobate[41], a species of estoppel has arisen which seems to be intermediate between estoppel by record and estoppel in pais. The principle that a person may not approbate and reprobate expresses two propositions, that the person in question, having a choice between two courses of conduct, is to be treated as having made an election from which he cannot resile, and[42], that he will not be regarded, in general at any rate, as having so elected unless he has taken a benefit under or arising out of the course of conduct, which, he has pursued and with which his subsequent conduct is inconsistent.

The principle of approbate and reprobate is based on the maxim "allegans contraria non est audiendus" meaning thereby that a person who says things contradictory to each other, shall not be heard.[43]

The principle of estoppel by election applies to both civil and criminal proceedings.[44]

The maxim that a person cannot 'approbate and reprobate' is only one application of the doctrine of election, and its operation must be confined to reliefs claimed in respect of the same transaction and to the persons who are parties thereto.

The principle of election does not forbid a party from claining the same relief against different persons in different suits in respect of the same property though the grounds of relief are different and inconsistent[45] and where there is absolutely no election in between the two alternative and mutually exclusive remedies or the two alternative courses of action, the principle of estoppel by election has no application, as is the situation in the instant case.[46]

The Supreme Court observed: "(1) The doctrine of approbation and reprobation, which has a Scottish origin and is akin to the law of election and estoppel, applies to those cases where a person has elected to take benefit otherwise than on merits of the claim in the litigation under an order to which benefit he could not have been entitled except for the order. (2) That the person receiving a benefit under the order must have a choice between two rights and that after the exercise of the choice, restituion was impossible or inequitable."[47]

The principle forbidding simultaneous approbation and reprobation is an equitable principle. So are the principles relating to estoppel. It is not true view of law that if one party does something under the dictate of an order or a decree, as is the instant case, and another party receives something thereby, then in every case the order or decree becomes unchallengeable by the recipient party. The nature of the receipt, in the instant case a nominal amount, has to be examined in the facts and circumstances of each case and then only the rules of good conscience must be applied.[48]

In a case of acquisition of land with a view to prospect for coal, the appellant Central Government did not question the payment of additional compensation and interest before the Tribunal when the matter was heard on reference. Subsequently, the appellant could not be allowed to turn back and say that the same was not payable.[49] An owner of property is not estopped from claiming just compensation under Section 8 of Requistitioning and Acquisition of Immovable Property Act (1952), merely because they had given low figure of annual rent for purposes of taxation.[50] Where the petitioner is given option by the Tribunal either to amend the petition, or to supply particulars or strike off the particular para as being vague, and the petitioner choses to amend, he loses his right to adopt the alternative.[51] If the parties have taken up a particular position before the Court at one stage of the litigation it is not open to them to approbate and reprobate and to resile from that position.[52] In Hemanta Kumari Devi v. Parasanna Kumar[53] Justice MUKHERJEE observed: "It is well settled that a party litigant cannot be permitted to assume inconsistent positions in court, to play fast and loose, to blow hot and cold, to approbate and reprobate, to the deteriment of his opponent; and that this wholesome doctrine applies not only to the successive stages of the same suit, but also to another suit other than the one in which the position was taken up, provided the second suit grows out of the judgment in the first."[54] A party who successfully took a plea and got a judgement in his favour cannot be allowed to take an inconsistent position in any action, arising out of the said judgement. This principle has been applied even to cases where a question of jurisdiction is involved.[55]

Where in an earlier proceeding the Tahsildar had passed order deleting the name of a person as the tenant of a certain land, the Tahsildar could not initiate a suo motu proceeding subsequently and declare him tenant.[56] Where a party succeeded on the plea that the Revenue Court or Rent Control Court had no jurisdiction to entertain the application of the petitioner, and the civil court alone had jurisdiction, later cannot turn round in the civil court and say that the civil court had no jurisdiction.[57]

A litigant cannot be permitted to assume inconsistent positions in court to the detriment of his opponent.[58] A person getting advantage of his plea in a prior suit is not entitled to take a plea inconsistent therewith in a subsequent suit.[59]

The two essential elements of an election are:—(1) That the person who is electing should have a choice between the two alternative courses, and, (2) he should derive an advantage, on such choice. A defendant adopting the valuation made by the plaintiff for the purpose of filing an appeal cannot be said to have a choice in the matter as he is generally bound to adopt the valuation made by the opposite party.

The rule that a party to a litigation cannot both approbate and reprobate is a rule essentially of logic rather than of law, based on the principle that where a party to a litigation has deliberately taken a particular position (without being induced so to take it by the opposite party), he must act consistently with it. The rule is different from estoppel. In the case of an estoppel, the representee should have altered his position to his detriment, for the rule of approbate and reprobate to apply, the representor must have obtained an advantage by the representation made or the stand taken by him.

The principle variously known as approbate and reprobate is an application of the doctrine of election.[60]

Where there was termination of service at the request of the Government servant, he cannot challenge the order as invalid on the ground that it was made under a non-existing rule, as he once elected his choice to have his service terminated.[61] Where a man is entitled to one of the two inconsistent rights and he has with full knowledge done an unequivocal act indicating his choice of the one he cannot afterwards persue the other.[62] A person who has acted as a trustee of a public temple as evinced by his own admission and conduct and who has obtained decrees of the courts in that capacity cannot subsequently turn round and claim the temple to be private temple, or the properties as his absolute properties.[63] Where an order of requisition was served on the wife treating her as owner of the house and the wife challenged the requisition order, it is not open to the Government, to plead that the real owner was her husband on whom an earlier order of requisition had been served.[64] Where the stand taken by the respondent in the proceedings under Order XXI, R. 97, C.P.C., throughout was that he was not the judgement debtor and that therefore the executing court could not proceed against him under Rule 98, it was not open to him to contend later on that he was in fact a representative of the judgement debtor and as such the only remedy open to the appellant lay in execution.[65] The defendant in a case successfully contested the competency of execution proceedings started on the basis of a decree on the award, on the ground that the decree contemplated enforcement of the claim by means of a separate suit, he cannot be allowed to say, when the plaintiff filed such a suit that the suit was not an appropriate remedy and it was barred u/Section 47, Civil Procedure Code.[66]

In a previous writ petition u/Art. 32 before the Supreme Court, the case of the petitioner was that he had purchased at auction the whole village R for cultivation under a sale deed which clearly stated that small area of land had already been sold to another. The Supreme Court held that the village R fell within the inclusive part of the definition of 'an estate' u/Art. 31-A (2)(a)(iii) of the Constitution and therefore the validity of the Daman Regulation of 1962 was protected from challenging u/Arts. 14, 19 and 31 of the Constitution. In a subsequent writ petition before the High Court, between the same parties, the petitioner's contention was that he was not the holder of the whole village R and as such was not a proprietor as defined in Section 2(h) of the Regulation. It has held, that the doctrine of approbate and reprobate applied to the conduct of the petitioner and he should not be permitted to depart from the unequivocal stand taken by him in the Supreme Court. A person who purchased at a sale with full knowledge that the judgement debtor had no saleable interest in property, is precluded from subsequently contending that the sale was void and that he should get a refund of the purchase money. To such a person, the doctrine that a person cannot approbate and reprobate is applicable.[67] A party cannot be allowed to accept a document for some purpose and reject the same document to his advantage, the rule of approbate and reprobate applies.[68] A person having some advantage under a transaction as a valid one which otherwise he would not be entitled to, cannot say that it was invalid for purpose of securing some further advantage.[69] Where a deed reserving annual rent provided that on termination of lease, lessee should hand over possession of property along with buildings and trees, the lessee on termination of lease claimed compensation for tress planted. It was held that the lessee could not blow hot and cold, for if he relied upon lease deed, he was not entitled to get compensation and if the lease deed was inadmissible for want of registration, he would not be entitled to compensation in respect of improvements effected on property demised.[70]

A person who specifically avers that a document is a Will cannot be allowed to say that it is not a Will but a family arrangement.[71] If a person chooses to accept a legacy under a Will, he will be estopped from setting up a title contrary to its provisions.[72] A Hindu Coparcener who took the property under a Will of another coparcener and acted on the terms of the Will, and his transferees who bought the property with notice of his title, are estopped from questioning the Will.[73]

The rule of estoppel or waiver cannot be applied against retrenched workmen who have no freedom to refuse payment in view of their financial position caused by the retrenchment.[74] If a person by force of circumstances is compelled to adopt one of the two courses, it cannot be said that he had two courses open to him and that he adopted one and abandoned the other, there is no question of estoppel by election in such case.[75] The right to realise cess, like the right to realise rent, accrues periodically and, if the person entitled to cause for any particular period chooses, either deliberately or through misapprehension of his right, to accept in satisfaction of his dues less than he is entitled to, his act will not estop him from claiming his full dues for a subsequent period subject to the law of limitation.[76] If the reliefs in alternative are interlinked, plaintiffs cannot be put on election to choose between reliefs[77] but where the petitioner had already instituted a civil suit for the forgery of documents, writ petition was not maintainable for the same relief.[78] Execution of promissory note by purchaser for amount due to vendor, does not extinguish vendor's lien under Section 55 of the T.P. Act and such execution does not estop the vendor from an action on such lien.[79]

To preclude a party from 'blowing hot and cold' or 'playing fast and loose' or to use a more common expression, from 'approbating and reprobating' one must establish a case of estoppel, waiver or acquiescence to invoke the well-known principles, underlying res judicata or election.[80]

A party having claimed on the basis of the investment in commercial speculations, cannot claim on another basis when he finds that the first basis is prejudicial to him.[81] A party cannot both approbate and reprobate, and cannot induce another party to alter his position by a representation and then to go back on that representation.[82] Plaintiff's father had settled a dispute and received his share of sale-proceeds of trust property sold by trustee, plaintiff could not charge the trustee for committing breach of trust nor could follow the alleged trust properties on the principle of estoppel.[83]

Doctrine of approbate and reprobate can apply only to orders passed by a court of competent jurisdiction notwithstanding that it was passed with or without consent of parties.[84] The accused pleaded in a previous trial that the prosecution was invalid for want of proper sanction. His plea was accepted and he was acquitted. He was prosecuted again on fresh sanction. The accused is estopped from pleading double jeopardy on the ground that the previous trial was valid. He cannot approbate and reprobate.[85] A party obtaining relief or benefit by an order of a court or tribunal is estopped from challenging that order subsequently by a suit on the ground that it was made without jurisdiction or was not correct.[86] Decree holder creditors applying for rateable distribution of assets held by executing court in another decree passed by the High Court, can not challenge the decree under which the assets were held, as invalid, on the ground that the High Court had no jurisdiction under Cl. 12 of Letters Patent to pass decree for sale of properties outside the local limits of its ordinary original jurisdiction.[87] Where a person enjoyed full benefit of a trial after remand of a case he is estopped from challenging the legality of order of remand.[88]

In a case the petitioners were declared owners/bhomidhars of the land acquired by the government and received compensation in respect to that land. After a gap of about ten years they challenged the notifications of acquisition and the award of compensation stating that the Government was owner of the said land and hence it could not acquire its own land. It was held that they could not be allowed to approbate and reprobate as they had never accepted the Government as owner earlier.[89] Where the respondent State though aware of the interim stay order, ignored the same and proceeded with the acquisition proceedings, they could not be permitted to take any advantage of the said interim order.[90] Where the consignee obtained delivery of goods from the carrier after inspection and found no damage

When the scrutiny of nomination papers was adjourned at the instance of a party, it does not lie in his mouth to call in question the act of adjournment by the returning officer.[3] Where a party seeks amendment of an election petition and obtains an order in his favour from the tribunal, he cannot turn round and say that amendment must be ignored.[4] The candidate contesting the election and also succeeding cannot allege that the election process was unlawful.[5]

Where a party volunteered before the arbitrator for extending time, his conduct of questioning of extending time was hit by the principle of approbate and reprobate.[6]

When an assee company makes a representation under one section of the Finance Act and obtains a monetary benefit, it cannot change its front and deny the truth of the representation made earlier in order to avoid liability.[7]

A tenant in appeal against his eviction took the stand that S. 12(1)(h) of M.P. Act 41 of 1961 did not apply. In appeal by special leave, the tenant could not contend otherwise.[8] An order under Section 14(a) of West Bengal Premises Rent Control (Temporary Provisions) Act (17 of 1950), was passed accepting the contention that a person was a tenant, who submitted to it by making payment of rent month by month. The tenant later committed default in payment of rent. It was held that he could not turn round and avoid the result of his default by setting up plea that Section 14(4) does not apply to his case as he was not a tenant.[9]

Where a person has accepted the benefit of an auction sale by receiving a part of the surplus money, he cannot attack the auction sale.[10] Where the disputed land was sold in auction by the revenue court for arrears of rent after the plaintiff's objection against the sale was rejected and the plaintiff received the balance of the sale proceeds after adjusting the arrears of rent, it was held that she was estopped from challenging the propriety of the auction sale.[11]

Where the Industrial Tribunal rejected the plea of a protected workman under Section 33 of the Industrial Disputes Act at instance of the management, the management cannot be allowed to raise a plea in an appeal before the commissioner for workmen's compensation that since the employee claimed to be protected workman, the forum for relief is an application under Section 33 of the Industrial Disputes Act.[12]

Acceptance of the salaries and subsistence allowances by employees from the municipal corporation would debar them from turning round and claiming that all along they were employees of the Government, and that the corporations had no jurisdiction to take disciplinary action against them.[13] Where a person obtains a benefit from the other party by a transaction of exchange, he must be taken to have accepted the validity of the exchange. 32. ESTOPPEL BY ACCEPTING COSTS

Where an appeal was restored to file on condition of payment of cost and the opposite party withdrew the costs so deposited, he cannot challenge that order of restoration, having elected to treat the order as valid.[19]

Where proceedings were dismissed for default and restoration was ordered conditional on party's paying compensatory costs, the acceptance of amount of costs was held not to estop other party from raising challenge on a point of law as to the correctness of order on merits.[20] Where the costs were accepted under protest, there is no estoppel.[21] Where costs are granted on an unconditional order the respondent can have no opportunity to waive his right to question the validity or the correctness of the order and therefore acceptance of costs cannot be operated as estoppel, against him in the absence of proof of waiver.[22] Where there was a conditional order for restoration on payment of cost and only part of the cost deposited and withdrawn it was held that there was no estoppel to challenge the order for restoration.[23]

Defaulting purchaser's liability for deficiency on resale under Order XXI, R. 71, C.P.C., arises only if the deficiency is attributable to his default. When the first auction sale did not disclose any encumbrance but the second sale discloses the encumbrance, the auction purchaser could not be estopped from contending that the disclosure of the encumbrance in the second sale was the operative cause for the fall of the price and he is not a defaulter u/O. XXI, R. 71, C.P.C. The auction purchaser is not estopped from impeaching the charge or incumbrance over the property though he purchased it subject to charge or incumbrance. As the auction purchaser buys the property with all risks and defects in the judgement debtor's title, if it was found that charge or incumbrance to be invalid, he is entitled to the benefit thereof.[31] Where a compromise in execution, provides merely, the mode of discharging decree, no new contract is created and the decree can be executed when the judgement debtor failed to comply with the compromise subject to limitation and no estoppel applies and a separate suit is not necessary.[32] Where a compromise petition in execution proceedings did not disclose that any statement amounting to a representation was made by A, and upon the footing of that representation anything was done by B, it was held that the compromise petition did not estop A from challenging the sale in execution of the decree.[33]

Where the judgement debtor had notice under O. XXI, R. 66, C.P.C. and had knowledge of the contents of the sale proclamation and did not object as to the valuation, misdescription of the property was not saleable or transferable, he would be estopped from raising objection later and question the sale as to legality of the sale or of the attachment.[34] In the previous proceedings, under O. XXI, R. 90, C.P.C., based on the ground that the attachment was invalid, the objector, by a compromise obtained time from the decree holder to pay his decretal dues and agreed that on failure to pay, the court-sale in favour of the decree-holder would stand good. The objector failed to pay and the court sale was confirmed. The objector would be estopped to turn round and contest the legality of the sale or of the attachment in subsequent proceedings.[35]

36. KINDS OF ESTOPPEL

There are different kinds of estoppels: (1) estoppels by matter of record; (2) estoppels by deed; and (3) estoppels in pais.

37. ESTOPPEL BY RECORD—ESTOPPEL AND RES JUDICATA

A matter of record is something part of the records of a Court. It is at once the narrative and the proof of its proceedings. Estoppel by records results from the judgment of a competent Court. The law allows a party ample opportunity, by way of appeal and otherwise, of upsetting a wrong decision. And if he takes the opportunity and fails, or does not choose to avail himself of it, he canot subsequently re-open or dispute that decision. And not only the parties themselves, but also the heir, executor, administrator and assignee of each of them are bound by the decision, for they are 'privy to the estoppel'.

Estoppel by matter of record is chiefly concerned with the effect of judgments and their admissibility in evidence, and this kind of estoppel is dealt with by Ss. 11 to 14, Civil Procedure Code, and Ss. 40-44 of the Evidence Act.

In HALSBURY 4th Ed., Vol. 16, Para. 1503, page. 1009 it is observed: "Estoppel of record or of quasi-record, also known as estoppel per rem judicatam, arises (1) where an issue of fact has been judicially determined in a final manner between the parties by a tribunal having jurisdiction, concurrent or exclusive, in the matter, and the same issue comes directly in question in subsequent proceedings between the same parties (this is sometimes known as cause of action estoppel); (2) where the first determination was by a court having exclusive jurisdiction, and the same issue comes incidentally in question in subsequent proceedings between the same parties (this is sometimes known as issue estoppel); (3) in some cases where an issue of fact affecting the status of a person or thing has been necessarily determined in a final manner as a substantive part of a judgment in rem of a tribunal having jurisdiction to determine that status, and the same issue comes directly in question in subsequent civil or criminal proceedings between any parties whatever.

Where the earlier decision is that of a court of record the resulting estoppel is said to be "of record"; where it is that of any other tribunal, whether constituted by agreement of the parties or otherwise, the estoppel is said to be "quasi of record".

The force and effect of a judgment depend first upon the nature of the proceedings in which it was rendered, i.e., upon the question whether it was an action in rem or in personam; and secondly upon the forum in which it was pronounced, i.e. upon the question whether it was a judgment of a domestic or foreign court. The record of a judgment in rem is generally conclusive upon all persons. In other cases, so far as the record purports to declare rights and duties, its material recitals import absolute variety between the parties to it and those who claim under them. The estoppel arising from or fixed by the fact enrolled constitutes the estoppel of a judgment. And to the question whether the judgment necessarily creates an estoppel, the general answer is, yes, if it resuls in res judicata; no, if it does not.[36]

The distinction between the doctrine of res judicata and the doctrine of estoppel was explained by MAHMOOD J., in Sitaram v. Amir Begum.[37]

"That the effect of the plea of res judicata may, in the result, operate like an estoppel by preventing a party to a litigation from denying the accuracy of the former adjudication, cannot be doubted. Perhaps the shortest way to describe the difference between the plea of res judicata and estoppel is that the while the former prohibits the court from adjudicating a matter already adjudicated upon, the latter prohibits a party after the enquiry has already been entered upon from proving anything which would contradict his own previous declaration or acts to the prejudice of another party who relying upon those declarations of acts, has altered his position. In other words res judicata prohibits an enquiry in limine, whilst an estoppel is only a piece of evidence." Res Judicata results from a decision of a court while estoppel results from declarations, conduct and acts of parties.

Estoppel by record is what is provided for in Section 11, Civil Procedure Code. It is not within the province of a court to introduce another kind of estoppel by judgement not covered by Section 11 of Civil Procedure Code or the general principles of res judicata.[38]

A compromise decree creates an estoppel by judgment. A judgment operates as estoppel as regards all the findings which are essential to sustain the judgement.[39]

Estoppel precludes evidence being led to prove a fact in issue in respect of which evidence had already been led and a specific finding recorded in an earlier criminal proceeding before a court of competent jurisdiction.[40]

The essence of estoppel by judgement is that a party cannot be allowed to say one thing at one time and another at a later time. A judgment can be an estoppel only as between the parties to it unless it is a judgment in rem which is binding against all the world.[41] Matter decided at an earlier stage of the same suit or proceeding would be binding between parties at a subsequent stage.[42] Where the plaintiff's title over the suit property was held to be established on the basis of a valid sale-deed, subsequent suit for declaration of title by the defendant was barred by res judicata.[43] Once a party makes a submission before the High Court it is estopped to say otherwise later on.[44] Principle of res judicata would apply where the order of the Court has become final.[45] In order that a plea for exclusion of evidence in second trial on ground of issue of estoppel be allowed, the issue must have been distinctly raised and decided in the previous trial.[46] Doctrine of binding nature of the decree either by way of res judicata or otherwise, will have no application as against transferee for valuable consideration and without notice, in the case of a mere declaratory decree. Where, however, the decree is executable and the property charged can be sold in execution of the decree, the transferee will be bound by the decree and in such a case it is wholly immaterial whether the decree itself created the charge or the charge was created by a compromise or an award which was embodied in the decree.[47]

In a suit by a municipal board for restraining enforcement of restitution order against it on the ground that ownership in property vested in it, it was held that the Board could not be estopped from maintaining the regular suit since the question of ownership was not decided in a previous suit against it.[48] Grounds decided in favour of detenu at a previous trial canot be made basis for his subsequent detention.[49] Where there were contemporaneous suits between the same parties in respect of the same subject-matter and they were disposed of by a common judgment but two decrees passed and against one decree an appeal was prepared, the fact that there was one unappealed decree does not create an estoppel in the proceeding under appeal.[50] In the absence of judgement and decree passed in the previous suit for maintenance, the admitted facts cannot take the place of estoppel by record and hence a subsequent suit for recovery of maintenance cannot be barred by res judicata.[51] The court which pronounces a judgment or order must have inherent jurisdiction to do so, otherwise, the judgement or order has no effect. Such a judgement or order cannot operate as an estoppel even against the person who sought the assistance of the court whose jurisdiction is impunged.[52] Res judicata based on principle of estoppel by record does not arise out of a decision which is a nullity.[53]

It is the final decision and not any and every expression of opinion in a judgment which gives rise to an estoppel by record, and the actual decision cannot be carried further than the circumstances warrant.[54]

The general principle which runs through the doctrine of estoppel by record is that a decree is an order of the Court and the judgment-debtor must, when it has once been completed, obey it unless and until he can get it set aside in proceedings duly constituted for the purpose.[55]

A party accepting payment under an arbitrator's award cannot afterwards challenge it.[56]

Estoppel by record is not applicable to taxation matters.[57] Although the principle of estoppel or res judicata does not strictly apply to the Income-tax Authorities, it is not open to a Tribunal to come to a different conclusion to the one arrived at by that very Tribunal earlier without any limitation whatsoever. An earlier decision on the same question cannot be reopened if that decision is not arbitrary or perverse, if it has been arrived at after due inquiry, if no fresh facts are placed before the Tribunal giving the later decision, and if the Tribunal giving the earlier decision has taken into consideration all material evidence.[58]

G having adopted the plaintiff as a son to her deceased husband, disputes arose between her and the defendant, her mother-in-law, regarding the validity of the adoption. The arbitrator to whom the disputes were referred declared that the plaintiff's adoption was invalid, that the right of adoption was lost to G from the very beginning and that nevertheless with the object of obtaining peace and goodwill the defendant should pay Rs. 8,000 to the plaintiff. A decree in terms of the award was obtained, the plaintiff having admitted the terms thereof and the receipt of Rs. 8,000. Subsequently G again adopted the plaintiff. Held that though the plaintiff was litigating under the same title, the bar of res judicata would not apply as the previous decree was passed in terms of the compromise, but that the underlying principle of estoppel was applicable and the plaintiff was estopped from contending that G had the right to adopt him even if the matter had passed from the stage of mere representation into an agreement.[59] Decision in an appeal filed by an assessee who is an ex-partner of an unregistered firm and where each of the ex-partners was assessed separately, is not binding on others as res judicata or estoppel.[60] Where in accidental claim cases directions were issued to the owner of the vehicle for the payment of the compensation awarded appeal against which for enhancement was not filed either by the owner or the claimant in one of the cases and the claimants had also the right to contend that the award should be satisfied by the insurance company, non-filing of appeal in the said case cannot defeat such right and would not operate as res judicata.[61] Where an earlier petition filed by a private party for corruption against a Chief Minister on the basis of CAG report and limited documents then available was dismissed, the police was not estopped from filing another petition on the basis of additional material on the same subject matter. The principle of res-judicata would not apply.[62] Where the private complaint filed under Section 15(2) of the Contempt of Courts Act by an Advocate Commissioner who was restrained from executing a search warrant was dismissed for default, it does not operate as bar against contempt proceedings initiated by the High Court on the basis of the report of the Magistrate. The doctrine of estoppel or principle of res judicata was not attracted.[63]

Where in an earlier proceeding the High Court held that the jurisdiction of the Civil Court to decide the disputed question of title to a certain suit land was not barred, the Courts jurisdiction could not be challenged in a subsequent proceeding on the same grounds.[64]

38. ISSUE ESTOPPEL

The basic principle underlying the rule of issue estoppel is that the same issue of fact and law must have been determined in the previous litigation[65]. The court has inherent jurisdiction as a matter of discretion in the interests of finality and not to allow a particular issue which has already been litigated to be reopened.[66] Where no issue was decided, the principle of res judicata, constructive or otherwise cannot be attracted.[67] Principle of issue estoppel is simply this that, where an issue of fact has been tried by a competent court on a former occasion and a finding has been reached in favour of an accused, such a finding would constitute an estoppel or res judicata against the prosecution not as a bar to the trtial and conviction of the accused for a different and distinct offence but as precluding the reception of evidence to disturb that finding of fact when the accused is tried subsequently even for a different offence which might be permitted by law.[68] Not only the parties in the two trials must be the same but also fact in issue proved or not in the earlier trial must be indentical with what is sought to be regitated in the subsequent trial.[69] The principle of issue estoppel is different from double-jeopardly or autre fois acquit. For issue estoppel to arise there must have been distinctly raised and inevitably decided the same issue in earlier proceedings between the same parties. It does not prevent the subsequent trial but relates to the admissibility of evidence to upset the finding of fact. The rule is in accord with sound principle and Section 300, Cr. PC (Section 403 Cr PC old) does not prevent its application.[70]

The doctrine of issue estoppel applies as much in the case of criminal proceedings as in civil proceedings.[71]

Where a Magistrate acquitted the accused on a minor offence and it was set aside and later the accused was committed for a major offence, it was held that the principle of res judicata would not apply.[72] Where a person as prosecuted for defalcation committed by him in his capacity as cashier, and he was acquitted by the High Court in an earlier case of defalcation on finding that he was not in charge of cash, it was held that the finding of the High Court, in the earlier case did not operate as issue estoppel in the subsequent case since the subsequent defalcation related to an altogether different period.[73] When earlier order that it was exempt from sales tax was made on the basis of only one sample sent by assessee, and later the assessee sent 26 samples for determination as to taxability, there is no issue estoppel.[74] Proceedings in connection with Foreigners (Internment) Order Para 5 are not criminal proceedings. Hence where in a prosecution under Section 14 of Foreigners Act accused is acquitted on the ground that he is not a foreinger, that decision does not operate as issue estoppel to bar subsequent action against the same person under Para 5 of Foreigners (Internment) Order 1962 to deport him as a Foreigner.[75] Two identical cases were filed by the Government. Later a G.O. was passed regarding withdrawal of one case. It cannot be said that other cases should be dismissed on basis of the doctrine of issue estoppel.[76] Where the first suit for judicial separation was withdrawn on persuasion of friends, a second suit for divorce on the same grounds is not barred by estoppel.[77] There is a distinction between a case where the defendant consents to a judgment after pleading the defence, and a case where he consents to a judgment before setting up any pleading. The defendant in the latter case is not estopped as against the plaintiff from subsequently setting up matters which might have constituted the defence because there has never been an issue before the consent decree.[78]

Where the revision against rejection of accused's prayer under Section 337 (1), Cr. P.C. for summoning a witness, was rejected on the ground of limitation and the enquiry thereafter proceeded in the trial court, the acused is estopped from raising the same issue again in an application under Section 337(1), Cr. P.C.[79]

Merely because in previous years the plaintiff claimed mesne profits at reduced rates, there is no question of estoppel for subsequent years. It is no doubt a circumstance to be taken into account for purpose of ascertainment of mesne profits but the admission in plaint is by no means conclusive, as the claim at low rate might well have been to avoid payment of court fee.[80]

39. ESTOPPEL BY DEED

Doctrine of estoppel by deed would apply as pointed out by Dalton v. Fitzerald[81], when the person sought to be estopped or his predecessor in interest has obtained possession of property or some advantage under the deed.[82]

If a document is fictitious, it is of no legal consequence and the parties to such a document are not bound by the contents thereof.[83]

A vendor seeking to enforce an option of repurchase contained in the original sale deed is not estopped from taking the conveyance from the vendee even if he knew at the time of original agreement that he was not the rightful owner.[84]

Where the recital in a deed is intended to be a statement which all the parties to the deed have mutually agreed to admit as true, it is an estoppel upon all. But where it is intended to be a statement of one party only the estoppel is confined to that party when in a deed of sale, the vendors make unilateral statement that the vendors are inamdars of the property transferred, the vendees are not bound by it and they are not estopped from denying that fact.[85]

Where the plaintiff signed the partition deed partitioning the properties belonging to the family and the relinquishment deed relinquishing his rights in favour of other member of the family, subsequently he could not file a suit for declaration of title over the said properties by pleading that there being no concept of joint family or right by birth under the Muslim Law, the said documents were void. He will have to file a suit for cancellation of those documents first.[86]

40. ESTOPPEL IN PAIS

Estoppel in pais (i.e. "in the country", or "before the public"), or more fully "estoppel in pais de hors the instrument" (i.e. with regard to matters outside a record or deed) as known to the common law was of an entirely different character to the estoppel in pais of the present days. "Indeed the estoppel in pais of the present day has grown up entirely since the time of COKE, and embraces cases never contemplated in that character by him or by the lawyers of even much later times though old lines are often visible in the newer pathways."

Estoppel in pais arises (1) from agreement or contract; and (2) from act or conduct of mispresentation which has induced a change of position in accordance with the intention of the party against whom the estoppel is alleged.

Estoppel in pais is dealt with in Ss. 115 to 117. Sections 116 and 117 are instances of estoppel by contract, viz., that of the tenant, the licensee, the bailee and the acceptor of a bill of exchange. But the distinction between estoppel by contract and estoppel by conduct is not preserved in the Evidence Act.

See Commentary under the head "Conduct".

41. PROMISSORY ESTOPPEL

In HALSBURY 4th Ed., Vol. 16, Para: 1514, Page: 1017 it is observed: "When one party has, by his words or conduct, made to the other in clear and unequivocal[87] (per LORD CROSS of Chelsa) promise or assurance which was intended to affect the legal relations between them and to be acted on accordingly, then, once the other party has taken him at his word and acted on it, the one who gave the promise or assurance cannot afterwards be allowed to revert to their previous legal relations as if no such promise or assurance had been made by him, but he must accept their legal relations subject to the qualification which he himself has so introduced. This doctrine, which is derived from a principle of enquiry enunciated in 1877, has been the subject of considerable recent development and is still expanding. It differs from estoppel in pais in that the representation relied upon need not be one of present fact.

The doctrine cannot create any new cause of action where none existed before, and it is subject to the qualification (1) that the other party has altered his position; (2) that the promisor can resile from his promise on giving reasonable notice, which need not be a formal notice, giving the promisee a reasonable opportunity of resuming his position; (3) the promise only becomes final and irrevocable if the promisee can not resume his position. The doctrine is known variously as "equitable" or "promissory" or "quasi" estoppel. It is a doctrine evolved by equity in order to prevent injustice.[88]

Promissory estoppel proceeds on the footing that when on the representation of a promisor, a promisee alters his position then the former must keep his word and is not allowed to recede from his promise.[89] Merely by applying for job and receiving call letter, it cannot be said that the petitioner has 'changed or altered' his position after having been declared to have passed the university examination and the university was not debarred from cancelling his results subsequently.[90]

There need not be a pre-existing contractual relationship between the parties provided there is a pre-existing legal relationship which could in certain circumstances give rise to penalties and liabilities.[91] The principle also applies where the promise affects a legal relationship which will arise in the futures. Where the landlord, who assured his tenant that if the tenant gave up premise in respect of which the tenant had statutory security of tenure and moved into other premises owned by the same landlord, the tenant would enjoy the same security of tenure, and that so long as the tenant contained to practise his profession, the landlord would not ask him to leave the premises, was estopped from alleging that the tenant had no statutory security in the second premises so as to claim possession from the tenant before he had ceased to carry on his profession.[92]

In its inception the equitable principle was that if parties who had entered into definite legal relations afterwards entered "upon a course of negotiations which has the effect of leading one of the parties to suppose that the strict rights arising under the contract will not be enforced, or will be kept in suspense, or held in abeyance, the person who otherwise might have enforced those rights will not be allowed to enforce them where it would be inequitable, having regad to the dealings which have thus taken place between the parties."[93]

"A promise intended to be binding, intended to be acted on and in fact acted on, is binding so far its terms properly apply." per Lord DENNING in.[94]

Lord DENNING stated "The principle does not create new causes of action where none existed before. It only prevents a party from insisting upon his strict legal rights, when it would be unjust to allow him to enforce them, having regard to the dealings which have taken place between the parties....."[95]

Promissory estoppel as laid down in the English cases has been applied in India.[1]

In order that doctrine of promissory estoppel may operate, the promise must be clear and unequivocal.[2] Mere inviting applications for allotment of houses, does not create a right; subsequent announcement to give priority to unsuccessful candidates in future, cannot be construed as promise by the Board and the Authority constituted superseding the Board and formulating a fresh scheme was not bound by earlier announcements made by the Board.[3]

The doctrine of promissory estoppel, has the effect of creating substantive rights against the representee and can be viewed as a rule of substantive law. A representation of fact or intention on which the doctrine is founded if intended to be acted upon and when acted upon becomes actionable. The claim for the relief depends upon that representation, which constitutes the cause of action. The representation, be it of promise, or intention or future conduct, on which this doctrine of promissory estoppel is founded is susceptible of generating enforceable promises and binding contractual obligations even where there is no consideration, such as at common law would have supported the promises and obligation.[4]

It is not necessary that the promisee should suffer detriment. It is enough if he acts on the representation and alters his position.[5] Where a party made heavy investments on the modernisation of his rice mill allegedly under the Govt. Incentive Scheme but no approval was obtained as required by the said Scheme, he could not be said to be induced by the said scheme to change his position by spending a huge sum.[6]

"If a promise is acted upon such action in law as in physics must necessary result in an alteration of position". LORD DENNING in High Trees case.[7]

Alteration of position by promise is the only requirement for application of promissory estoppel, damage, prejudice or detriment to the promise need not be proved.[8] The doctrine of promissory estoppel applies when, there is a clear and unequivocal promise relying on which the other side has acted to his prejudice[9] but it does not bind other persons or saddle liability on other persons because of the statement of a third person.[10]

Promissory estoppel is not maintainable when objection to it was not raised by the petitioner earlier, but raised for the first time in writ petition.[11]

Where a company undertook to discharge tax liability of a share holder in respect of undistributed dividend and acting upon the undertaking discharged the liability, it was estopped from claiming reimburse from the share holder.[12] Where flats were allotted by the H.P. Housing Board pursuant to sanction of lay-out plan with an area earmarked for community facilities in it, the Board could not subsequently take plea that no promise was held out by it to provide community facilities to the residents.[13] Where the vendee under a contract for the sale of immovable property stated to the vendor that his money was ready and that the title deed was being prepared where those two matters alone were wanting to complete the sale and where the vendor gave five days notice to the vendee-calling upon him to complete the sale, it was held that the vendee was estopped from denying the truth of statement.[14]

Where rebate was granted by the State Electricity Board in demand and energy charges from the date of going into regular production which was subsequently withdrawn, a company starting production after the date of withdrawal was not entitled to rebate.[15] Doctrine of estoppel could not be applied where rebate was considered before the agreement but was not contemplated in the agreement.[16] Where the Govt. granted exemption from entertainment tax at higher rates to those constructing cinema buildings which was subsequently modified, those applying after the modification order could not invoke the principle of promissory estoppel for the exemption granted prior to the modification order.[17] The doctrine of promissory estoppel or legitimate expectation is not attracted where the assurance was conditional and the conditions were not timely fulfilled.[18] Where a section of the Act empowered the Govt. to amend the provisions of the schedule giving tariff concession to the new industries for five years and the Govt. imposed a condition before the expiry of five years, the doctrine of promissory estoppel could not be invoked against the Govt.[19] However an application by an industrial unit for incentive scheme of Govt. submitted on the date of expiry of the scheme, could not be rejected on the ground that it was not processed before expiry of the scheme.[20] The doctrine of promissory estoppel has to yield when equity demands it. Where the industries found to be sick due to mismanagement, were unwilling to follow certain suggestions, the benefit of rehabilitation scheme was declined to them.[21] The doctrine of promissory estoppel, being an equitable doctrine, should not be reduced to rule of thumb and be kept elastic enough in the hands of the Courts to do complete justice between the parties.[22] Where the petitioner never intended to establish the industry on the basis of representation under the Incentive Scheme of the Govt. and did not apply for registration under the said scheme, it was not entitled to invoke the doctrine of promissory estoppel.[23] Where there was no proof of any promise held out by the Municipal Corporation, the doctrine of promissory estoppel could not be enforced against the Corporation.[24] The promise of the municipal corporation to accept the tender, if the tenderer is willing to pay the entire bid amount within sixty days from the date of receipt of the final acceptance, is no ground for acceptance of the tender on the principle of promissory estoppel.[25] Enforcement of an assurance under the doctrine of promissory estoppel is not based on the terms of the contract, but the nature of the assurance held out which is acted upon by the assured persons who alter their position owing to such assurance.[26]

42. PRINCIPLES GOVERNING APPLICATION OF PROMISSORY ESTOPPEL

The application of "promissory estoppel" is governed by the following principles :

(1) The legislature can never be precluded from exercising its functions to legislate by invoking the principles of promissory estoppel.

(2) Principles of 'promissory estoppel' can be invoked against the Govt. or public authority subject to the following :

(i) It cannot be invoked to compel it to act contrary to the obligation or liability imposed by law.

(ii) The doctrine of 'promissory estoppel' being an equitable doctrine, if it is established on the facts and circumstances that it would be inequitable, in the larger public interest, to hold the Govt. or public authority to the promise or representation made by it, it will not be enforced.

(iii) The doctrine cannot be invoked when the representation made by the officer or authority is beyond their powers.

(iv) The doctrine being an equitable one cannot be invoked, if it is shown that the representation was obtained by playing fraud, having regard to the fact that fraud vitiates everything.[27]

43. GOVERNMENT AND PROMISSORY ESTOPPEL

Government and its agencies are no longer immune from the operation of the doctrine of promissory estoppel. Government agencies have to work within the framework of the legal system. Where the Working Group consisting of the representatives inter alia of the Central Govt. and Engineering Export Promotion Council was an instrumentality of the State, the Govt. was bound by the promise given by the Working Group to the concerned company.[28] The Govt. cannot resile from its promise simply on account of change of Govt.[29] The doctrine of promissory estoppel applies in the facts and circumstances of a given case, whether such a policy is considered as government action or as subordinate delegated legislation.[30] The Government is not exempt from the equity arising out of the acts done by citizens to their prejudice, relying upon the representations as to its future conduct made by the Government[31]. Public bodies are as much bound as private individuals to carry out representations of facts and promises made by them, relying on which other persons have altered their position to their prejudice.[32] The Govt. cannot invoke the defence of executive necessity or freedom of future executive action.[33]

The Express News Paper Pvt. Ltd., having acted upon the grant of permission by the then Minister for Works and Housing and constructed the new Express building with a double basement in conformity with the permission granted by the lessor i.e. Union of India with the concurrence of Delhi Development Authority in view of the master plan, it was held that the lessor was precluded from contending that the order of the Minister was illegal, improper or invalid by application of the doctrine promissory estoppel.[34] Where the State Government held out certain specific promises as inducement for its employees to move into a newly created department, it was held that the employees having believed the representations by State Government and having acted thereon could not be denied rights and benefits promised to them.[35] Where as per notification of the Govt., all the successful candidates in the entrance examination were to be given six months teachers training, the Govt. could not subsequently restrict the admission to the extent of availability of seats.[36] Under an incentive scheme, enterpreneurs starting new industires were given sales tax concessions. Subsequently the order giving the concessions was withdrawn on the ground of misuse of the scheme and undue advantage taken by some enterpreneurs. However, relevant facts establishing such misuse was not placed before the court by the Government. It was held that the Govt., cannot resile from the promise and withdraw the concession.[37] But in a case involving payment of interest free sales tax loan, the state did not deny its liability but pleaded its inability due to paucity of funds, it was held that principle of promissory estoppel was not applicable.[38] Where the State Government had given an undertaking in an earlier petition before the Supreme Court, stating that erstwhile village officers possessing general qualification under the relevant Act would be absorbed irrespective of their age, it was held that the Government could not get round the undertaking by prescribing a maximum age limit for absorption of erstwhile village officers.[39] Where an industrial company started legal proceedings claiming that the lands held by it being for non-agricultural use were outside the purview of Maharashtra Agricultural Lands (Ceiling of Holdings) Act and on Government agreeing to exempt them under Section 47(1)(k), the company withdrew the legal proceedings, the Government was held estopped from denying that the lands were held for non-agricultural use. No question of estoppel against statute arises in such a case.[40] Where the Government issues notification reviving earlier acquisition proceedings and also commences fresh proceedings by issuing notification under Section 4 of the Acquisition Act and both notification are in force but represents to the claimant that fresh proceedings will be the basis for compensation and he omits to avail of remedies under the earlier proceedings relying on such representations, the Government is estopped from treating the proceedings as revived.[41] The Oil Corporation offered distributorship of L.P.G. Gas by a letter of intent and the petitioner made substantial financial investments under the letter of intent. Subsequently the letter of intent was cancelled on the recommendation of Oil Selection Board. It was held that the principle of promissory estoppel applied and the concellation of intent was not correct.[42] A site was granted by the Government to a Corporation for a market stating that no rent was to be charged. The Corporation was in possession for more than 70 years on a rent free basis. It was held that though the grant was invalid, it did not wipe out the representation that it would be rent free and Section 115 applied and the Corporation was entitled to be in possession in perpetuity without the liability to pay rent.[43] Where the State Government, promissed assignment of land for house sites for the employees of the Central Government Undertaking and later resiled from the promise after a long lapse of time on the ground that the State Government, employees should be given preference, it was held that the doctrine of promissory estoppel applies.[44] The doctrine of promissory estoppel also applied where a N R I sent some amount in foreign currency alongwith an application for allotment of a plot and on request by the Govt., holding out to him earmarking of the plot and issue of allotment letter, he paid the balance amount and the Govt. subsequently refused to allot him the plot on the ground of change of policy.[45]

The Central Government, announced export assistance scheme declaring cash assistance at a particular rate on export of certain materials. Later, it unilaterally withdrew cash assistance retrospectively. It was held that the withdrawal was invalid by virtue of promissory estoppel.[46] The detaining authority refused to supply the grounds of detention at first but passed order later promising to supply the same. The authority was held bound by promissory estoppel.[47] Under a truck, matador, bus hiring scheme sponsored by M.P. State Road Transport Corporation to provide employment to educated unemployed persons, the petitioners were granted to operate on certain routes as nominees of the Corporation. Subsequently the corporation invited fresh tenders from educated unemployed persons to operate transport service on various routes including those granted to the petitioners. It was held that the corporation was estopped from doing so.[48] Land was allotted on no loss no profit basis to the petitioners for setting up educational institutions. Subsequently, Delhi was divided into four zones. The Delhi Development Authority revised price of land depending upon the location of land. It was held that it was estopped from charging at a rate higher than fixed earlier.[49] In a case the order of State Govt. cancelling the allotment of land in exchange of land owned by the landholder after a period of thirteen years and without any notice to him was held to be illegal.[50] A contractor was promised renewal of a forest lease. He paid the requisites and incurred expenditure on improvement of the site. There was some delay in granting formal renewal. Ultimately the contractor was refused because of a shift in policy. The Madras High Court did not permit the Government to go back upon its promise.[51] The Government announced a scheme of exemption under the Industries Act. The applicant submitted his documents within the time delimited and commenced working. The Government took four years to dispose of his application telling him that the scheme was withdrawn. The High Court of Delhi ordered the Government to grant the intended benefits to the applicant.[52] The moral of these cases is that there can be no whimsical withdrawal from a declared programme which has already generated action.[53] Where an industrialist went to the extent of erecting a factory in response to declarations of vital exemptions, BHAGWATI J (now CJ retired) held the Government bound by the scheme in reference to the petitioner. It was immaterial that his factory was running at a profit. The doctrine of estoppel is not based upon loss or detriment but upon alteration of position in response to a representation.[54]

Estoppel can be invoked to hold the Government bound to its promises and agreements whether they be of executive or administrative character. A Town Development Authority was not permitted to raise prices arbitrarily[55]. Cigarette manufacturers did not collect excise on corrugated fibre board containers in which cigarettes were delivered at the factory gates on the basis of a Departmental letter. It was held that promissory estoppel was attracted.[56] The State Government allotted rectified spirit to petitioner company which put up a plant and machinery at a huge cost. The commissioner of prohibition allotted denatured spirit instead. The Plant and machinery were designed only for use of rectified spirit and the design can not have denatured spirit. It was held Government was estopped.[57] In respect of the office of S. Sajadanashin to a Durga Saheb, the Durga Committee and the parties proceeded on the basis that the heriditary office was entitled to be appointed by the descendants of the Saint who established the shrine by the rule of primogeniture, it was held that the Durga Committee would be estopped by their conduct to contend that it was not bound by the decision of the courts below, that the office was entitled to be claimed by the descendants of the Saint.[58]

Courts have power in appropriate cases to compel performance of the obligations imposed upon departmental authorities by orders which are executive in character when they find that any person has acted to his detriment on solemn promises made by the State Government or its authorities concerned.[59] Building was constructed by the petitioner as per plan sanctioned by the city corporation, occupancy certificate was also issued by it. Flats were sold to different persons. Notices were issued by the corporation after 3 to 4 years for demolition of the building. It was held that the corporation is equitably estopped from issuing notices for demolition.[60]

Under Section 115 of the Evidence Act, it is open to a party who had acted on a representation made by the Govt., to claim that the Government shall be bound to carry out the promise made by it, even though the promise was not recorded in the form of a formal contract.[61] Where the authorities make express or implied representation of a fact, it is not open to them to retract from it.[62] Petitioners were incurring expenditure to their prejudice and detriment acting on the representation of Government that they had a valid concession for supplying electric energy. Government acted for years as if they recognised and acknowledged the concession granted by the Portuguese Government. It was held that the Government was estopped from saying that they have not recognised the concession.[63] Where a person was appointed by a Municipal Committee, whose conditions of service were subject to approval of Government, on its satisfaction that the appointee possessed requisite qualification, the Government Official in his inspection report also found him to be holding the required qualification and he was retained in service for a long time, he could not be dismissed on the Government's direction that he did not possess the requisite diploma especially when other persons like him were in Government employment.[64]

Amounts were being sanctioned by the Government from time to time to a voluntary organisation set up to uplift tribal people. Later the Government stopped sanctioning the amounts without giving an opportunity to the organisation to place its case for continuance of funds. It was held the action of the Government was hit by the principle of estoppel. It is submitted that the decision cannot be regarded as correct as there can be no promise to continue assistance.[65] The representation made by the Govt. must be definite and clear, and not tentative or uncertain, otherwise it would not attract the doctrine of promissory estoppel nor confer any rights and impose any duties on the parties.[66]

Where permission to sell property has been granted, the cancellation of permission subsequently is not permissible by reason of estoppel.[67] After a lapse of thirteen years of continuous acknowledgement of the petitioner as the Secretary of the Co-operative Bank and dealing with him as such during that long period, it is no longer open to the Registrar of Co-operative Societies or the Bank to question the validity of his original appointment as Secretary.[68] In the circular pertaining to the appointment of Educational Panchayat Officers law degree was prescribed as qualification for the post. Petitioner, though not a law graduate, was still appointed and confirmed. It was held that estoppel operated against the Government and the petitioner could not be reverted as clerk.[69] Where the licensees, securing stocks and selling them as per direction of Government under Section 3 of the Essential Supplies (Temporary Powers) Act, 1946, and Madras Food Procurement Order (1946), became entitled to fixed Commission, they were estopped from contending that portion of the order asking them to make over the price was invalid.[70]

Where requisite fee has been paid on the basis of valuation made by the Government, it cannot afterwards challenge the valuation.[71]

Where on the basis of the representation made by the State Government that the lessee will be provided with alternate site and will enjoy the property for 90 years, the lessee surrendered the legal right created in his favour under the first lease deed and a valid lease-deed in respect of the alternate site was also executed and registered in his favour and thus the lessee changed his position to his prejudice relying on representation, the lessee is entitled on the basis of promissory estoppel to claim possession of the alternative site from the State Government.[72] The improvement Trust by passing resolution made a promise to a Co-operative Housing Society to release portion of land included in one of its schemes, for developing a housing colony for is members. The society in pursuance of that promise, went ahead with its plans and got a sale deed of land in dispute in its favour from the original holder of land. It was held that the Improvement Trust was estopped from going back on its promise and revoke its earlier sanction accorded by the resolution.[73] Where a company was induced to make part payment of consideration towards the sale price of land, on the basis of correspondence with different Govt. departments, to the effect that the said land was resolved to be industrial area and be handed over to the company, and receipt of part payment was duly acknowledged from time to time by the officers and the functionaries of the Improvement Trust, and in fact user of land was shown as industrial in the master plan also, the Govt. could not go back from its promise and consequently send notice for taking coercive action against the company alleging encroachment over the land in question.[74]

Where there was a scheme to give cash subsidy for setting up an industry and a co-operative society obtained a part of subsidy and expanded its industry by investing a huge amount, it was held that the principle of promissory estoppel applied and the authorities were directed to pay the balance.[75] The Govt. was held to be bound by its own earlier notice in respect of quantum of land to be acquired and could not challenge the same.[76]

Where the petitioner applicants were fully conscious of the fact that the costs of the flats allotted by the development authority was subject to change as per prevailing rates at the relevant time, the plea that costs indicated in the brochure were final and binding owing to principle of promissory estoppel, was not tenable.[77] Where at no point of time any promise was made to the petitioner that the timber would be supplied at the rate which was prevalent at the time of passing the sanction order, the principle of estoppel was not attracted and the respondents could supply the timber at the rate which is lawfully chargeable.[78] Where the Govt. reduced the assured price revision period of the supply of timber, it was held that it would not amount to any material breach of promise attracting promissory estoppel.[79] Minister's statement on the floor of the House does not amount to a promise or representation by the Government.[80] Where under a Government policy to transfer a sugar mill to Corporate Sector, possession of the said mill was handed over to the petitioner who failed to make payment of the sale-price hence the sale consideration was converted into loan which too he defaulted to pay, recovery proceedings were not barred on the ground that the letter of intent and the land was not transferred in his favour.[81]

44. NO ESTOPPEL

It was observed by KAILASAM J.:

(1) "The plea of promissory estoppel is not available against the exercise of the legislative functions of the State.

(2) The doctrine cannot be invoked for preventing the Govt. from discharging its functions under the law.

(3) When the officer of the Govt. acts outside the scope of his authority, the plea of promissory estoppel is not available. The doctrine of ultra vires will come into operation and the Govt. cannot be held bound by the unauthorised acts of its officers.

(4) When the officer acts within the scope of its authority under a scheme and enters into an agreement and makes a representation and a person acting on that representation puts himself in a disadvantageous position, the court is entitled to require the officer to act according to the scheme and the agreement or representation. The officer canot arbitrarily act on his mere whim and ignore his promise on some undefined and undisclosed ground of necessity or change the conditions to the prejudice of the person who had acted upon such representation and put himself in a disadvantageous position.

(5) The officer would be justified in changing the terms of the agreement to the prejudice of the other on special consideration, such as difficult foreign exchange position or other matters which have a bearing on general interest of the State."[82]

Refering to Jit Ram Shiv Kumar v. State of Haryana[83] and M.P. Sugar Mills v. State of U.P[84] the Supreme Court observed: "Of course, we must make it clear that, and that is also laid down in Motilal Sugar Mills' case, that there can be no promissory estoppel against the Legislature in the exercise of its legislative functions nor can the Government or public authority be debarred by promissory estoppel from enforcing a statutory prohibition. It is equally true that promissory estoppel cannot be used to compel the Government or a authority to carry out a representation or promise which is contrary to law or which was outside the authority or power of the officer of Government, or the public authority to make. We may also point out that the doctrine of promissory estoppel being an equitable doctrine, it must yield when the equity so requires, if it can be shown by the Government or public authority that having regard to the facts as they transpired, it would be inequitable to hold the Government and public authority to the promise or representation made by it, the court would not raise an equity in favour of the person to whom the promise or representation is made and enforce the promise or representation against the Government or public authority. The doctrine of promissory estoppel would be displaced in such a case, because on the facts, equity would not require that the Government or public authority should be held bound by the promise or representation made by it".[85]

The Legislature can never be prevented from exercising its legislative functions by resorting to promissory estoppel.[86] There cannot be any estoppel against the Government in exercise of its sovereign legislative, executive functions, where the Government finds necessary to review its policy.[87] It does not apply to the Government while acting in sovereign capacity unless it is necessary to prevent fraud or manifest injustice.[88] The doctrine of promissory estoppel cannot be invoked for preventing Government, from acting in discharge of its duty under law. The order of the Government directing levy of control in pursuance of resolution of Municipality under the law could not be challenged.[89] It can also not be invoked to compel an authority to do something which is not allowed by law or is prohibited by it.[90] Government is not estopped from claiming exemption from holding inquiry and giving opportunity under Art. 311(2) of the Constitution, even after the inquiry.[91] Estoppel cannot be claimed on the basis of a contract which does not satisfy the requirements of Art. 299.[92]

The power of Government to make rules under Section 12 of the Kerala Education Act, is not affected by agreement. The agreement cannot give rise to plea of estoppel against the Government.[93] Eventhough, sales of country liquor were exempted from sales tax at the time of auction of liquor licences, the Government is not estopped from subjecting sales to Sales Tax later.[94] The Electricity Board after negotiations with party agreed to supply electricity at cecessional rate. Later the agreement was annulled by an amending Act and uniform tariff imposed. It was held the Electricity Board was not estopped.[95] Where the tenants of the Bombay Port Trust made representation, the Port Trust by its estate manager stated that on deposit of certain amount they would be allotted flats after reconstruction of the building. It was held that no promissory estoppel would arise though executive necessity was not established.[96]

Prior to the amendment of the Army Rules re-employment of the retired or released army officers was not permissible. After the amendment they could be recruited by re-employment to the Post of Assistant Commandant. It was held that the action of the authorities calling for the opition of such officers for absorption would not operate as estoppel or confer any right to claim absorption.[97]

The Government can, for example, change export policy and thereby upset many a contratual commitments.[98] The Madras Education Rules and the Text Book Committee Rules did not hold out any representation or even an assurance to the publishers that the books once prescribed will not be changed within the period for which they are stated to be current. There is no justification for the assumption that these rules envisage the participation of the publishers in the scheme and that the Government is estopped from resiling from the representation that the period will not be altered.[99] Promissory estopeed is not an absolute doctrine which does not admit of any exception. One of the exceptions is change in policy by the Government in public interest.[1] However, mere ipsi dixit that there is a change in policy is not sufficient. The Government has to show that there is overriding public interest which compelled it to change its policy.[2] Indian Oil Company changed its policy regarding distributorship. This resulted in cessation of supply of lubricants to some dealers. The policy was implemented by the Oil Corporation uniformly without discrimination. It was held that the earlier transactions between the dealers and the Corporation did not confer on the dealers any contractual rights and the doctrine of promissory estoppel could not be invoked against the corporation.[3] A factory existed in the area prior to declaration of that area as pollution control area and the petitioner was later denied no objejction certificate question. It was held that the of promissory estoppel does not arise.[4] No promissory estoppel arose where the Government granted a cement permit and afterwards cancelled it on account of a change in policy.[5] Promissory estoppel is not available against abolition of a Government post.[6] Government had agreed that a vast tract of private forest purchased by the company would be immune from acquisition under the proposed legislation for acquisition of private forest for a period of sixty years. Plea of equitable estoppel cannot avail against the Government from acquiring those forests.[7] The State Government after considering the proposal of the Development Authority regarding a housing scheme, directed the authority to finalise the scheme. Subsequently the Government ordered revocation of the scheme since the scheme was not in public interest and was in violation of the master plan. It was held that the subsequent order of revocation of the scheme was not hit by the principle of estoppel.[8]

Even granting that there had been some representation on the part of the State Government, not to reduce the age of retirement, both the State Govt., and the officials concerned are bound by the impugned amendment reducing the age of retirement which is the result of the legislative action, as there is no estoppel against legislative action.[9] The power of the Central Government, to impose customs duty or grant, modify, withdraw exemption from duty is elgislative in nature. Orders made in that behalf take the place of delegated or subordinate legislation. No promissory estoppel can be raised against exercise of that power by the Government.[10]

The Government is also not bound by the acts of its Departments or officers which are beyond their powers or ultra vires.[11] Acceptance of rent by Patel and Patwari as agents of the Government under mistake of fact does not operate as estoppel against the Government in a suit for declaration of occupancy right.[12] Where certain officers of Govt. who were agents of the Govt. and were deputed to look after certain contract works and had no authority to give assurance for payment at enhanced rate proposed by contractor no etoppel against the Government could arise.[13] The State is not bound by doctrine of promissory estoppel for acts of its subordinate done in violation of its direction or administrative instructions.[14] An ultra vires act of an employee of a corporate body cannot bind the corporate body on the principle of equitable estoppel.[15] It is not bound by its illegal act when it subsequently changes its stand to be in conformity with law.[16] A release order as per Section 3 of the Imports and Exports Control Act (1947) was made by Joint Controller under mistaken belief that conditions for its issue were satisfied. It has held that the doctrine of equitable estoppel does not apply.[17] The State is not bound by the ultra vires acts of its agents.[18] Where a Government servant accepts damages for use and occupation from an unauthorised occupant, the Government is not estopped from saying that the occupant is an unauthorised occupant.[19] It was held by the Supreme Court that the holders of additional licence for 1978-79 were entitled to import only those goods which were included in 1985-88 of Import Policy and a letter was also issued by the Government of India making that position clear. Earlier to that a Government Official issued a letter which was contrary to the subsequent letter, it was held the earlier letter would not affect the position or create any estoppel.[20]

Exemption from purchase and sales tax in respect of raw materials was granted. It was held that the exemption was in the form of concession and could be withdrawn without violating rule of promissory estoppel[21] but promissory estoppel cannot be invoked to compel the Government to refund tax realised by it.[22] A Govt. scheme permitting the small scale industrial units to realise "Tax for growth fund" at prescribed rates and pay the same, to be utilised towards their repayment of loans, was held to be an arrangement to refund the Sales Tax to the manufacturing units, hence no promissory estoppel could be invoked against the withdrawal of the said scheme by the Govt.[23]

A Government servant retained accommodation beyond the concessional period of two months. He was liable to pay damages equivalent to the market rent for the period of such unauthorised occupation. It is an absolute liability. There was no representation or conduct amounting to representation on the part of the Government. As such it was held there could be no question of promissory estoppel in a matter of this kind.[24] Encroachers cannot invoke the principle of promissory estoppel.[25] Parties are bound to use Government aid only for sanctioned objects. Money sanctioned for payment of rent of school building was not allowed to be diverted to other heads.[26] Where a portion of darmashala lands was sold to the Local Fund Committee with the consent of the Government when there was no dispute about the ownership, the Government was not estopped from claiming ownership for the remaining property when the dispute arose between the Local Fund Committee and the Government.[27] Where land register is corrected by the Registrar on representation of the owner of the land there is no estoppel against the Registrar or the Government from asserting title to land.[28] Where the defendants had been receiving grant from the Government on the representation that a certain amount had to be paid on account of house rent for a school building it hardly lies in the mouth of the defendants to assert that there is no liability to pay rent for the school building.[29]

It was contended that the Electricity Board could not enhance duty because its predecessor, the State Government had held out assurance to the petitioner of supply of hydel power at low and fixed rates over a long term of years. Acting on such representations and assurance, the petitioner agreed to locate its factory at Hirakud a place away from the raw materials and market for the produce. Rejecting the contention it was held that the agreement was the result of negotiations. The petitioner was as much desirous of being supplied electric power as the supplier was anxious and willing to supply the same; hence he could not raise the plea of promissory estoppel.[30] A Government emplyee joined military service prior to the issue of a Government memorandum whereby certain concessions were offered to those who joined military service. The employee claimed benefit of concessions so offered. It was held that the doctrine of promissory estoppel had no application against the Government, since the employee could not be said to have altered his position by joining military service pursuant to representation made in the memorandum.[31] Where the condition of allotment of flats permitted the alloting authority to vary forms of allotment, authority can not be estopped from varying terms of allotments.[32] Interim payment of running bills under Road construction contract, is not conclusive as to the quality of work or material used by the contractor. Government is not estopped from withholding final bill and forferiting security deposit on the grounds of defective performance of the contract thereby.[33]

Where a city corporation leased land to petty shopkeepers and the lessees got evicted on termination of lease. The principle of promissory estoppel was held not attracted.[34] When a brochure was issued at the time of registration for allotment of houses indicating that the cost given in it was subject to variation, the increase in cost made subsequently by the Government, cannot be challenged on the ground of estoppel.[35] Where the Municipal Corporation took up the question of rehabilitation of squatters, there was no promise or representation to act in any manner nor any policy was formed to allot shops to such squatters. It was held that no direction can be given for allotment of alternative shops or no order prohibiting them from dispossessing such squatters can be made, and the principle of estoppel cannot be invoked.[36]

The supply of Electricity and other amenities by authorities for dwellers on lands, does not estop the Government from acquiring those lands.[37] Mere supply of electricity for building purpose and charging for the same would not estop the corporation from demolishing the structure on the ground of violating building regulations.[38]

The doctrine of promissory estoppel does not apply to criminal cases.[39]

45. CASUAL STATEMENT—NO ESTOPPEL

Admissions in affidavit of the Government in earlier similar proceedings and other admissions made in Parliament on behalf of the Government are mere expression of opinion limited to the context and also being rather vague promises but not specific assurances are not binding on the Government so as to create an estoppel.[40] The Government averred about employee's continuing in service as of right till his 58th year. In a subsequent writ petition the employee could not contend that the Government, was barred by plea of estoppel in terminating the service before she reached age of 58th year.[41] Representations made in advertisements issued by Public Service Commission for appointments in vacancies by selection, would not be binding on the Government. Estoppel could not be pleaded in the absence of fraud or manifest injustice.[42] The petitioner company offered to sell frozen meat to army authorities at competitive rates. Army authorities sent a reply stating that at the appropriate time, tender would be floated and the company could give its offer. Subsequently, the army authorities granted contract to another company without floating tender and at rates higher than those quoted by petitioner company. It was held that there is no estoppel as there was no representation about the rates in its letter.[43] Where a company undertook to export certain percentage of total production and the Government, promised subsequent assistance, but withdrew the promise, it was held that such withdrawal of promise does not give rise to estoppel against the Government.[44] Where there is absence of clear and unambiguous representation by the Government to grant exemption from tax, withdrawl of the exemption is not illegal. Promissory estoppel would not operate.[45] No estoppel is created by a Minister's statement in the House and reported in newspapers that no import tax would be levied on rice brought into the State.[46] Draft University Ordinance, which has been approved by the Faculty and Academic Council but not yet accepted by the Executive Council, is not binding. Mere fact that the authorities acted in accordance with the draft ordinance would not make the draft ordinance valid and binding and would in no way operate as estoppel against the University, in the absence of any direct representation by the University.[47]

46. EDUCATION AND ESTOPPEL

Estoppel presupposes equity in the conduct of the claimant. A student who is a party to the issue of false marks-sheet cannot rely on it.[48] Where a marks-sheet showed failing marks but the remarks column showed "passed", the mistake being patent, the Board was not estopped from cancelling the result[49] A marks-sheet obtained by fraud can be rectified.[50] Where an ineligible candidate secured admission in teachers training school on payment of capitation fees and completed two years course, withholding of his result on the ground of ineligibility was held to be not improper and the plea of estoppel by the candidate was not tenable.[51] Where an ineligible candidate was admitted to a professional course by the College, the University was justified in disapproving his admission.[52] But where the entire strength of the examinees was only twelve, cancellation of their result on account of recourse to malpractice of mass copying without giving them hearing, was against the principles of natural justice and the petitioner, being one of them, was entitled to get the benefit of promissory estoppel[53] but the students allegedly found guilty of using unfair means in the examination were allowed to join the terms of the next year under the interim orders of the High Court, the university was not estopped from altering the results subsequently on the basis of the decision of the syndicate finding them guilty., The Syndicate had powers to alter results even beyond two months.[54]

The Andhra Pradesh High Court allowed an institution to cancel an admission obtained on the basis of a false certificate even though the falsity was discovered after four years of study[55] But the Patna High Court did not allow this to be done when the candidiate was in the fifth year.[56] An admission on the basis of a false certificate of caste can be cancelled[57]. But Rajasthan High Court did not permit it to be cancelled after three of four years.[58]

Where an institution makes an error in an admission it may cancel the same if the mistake is on a point of law. An admission was accordingly allowed to be cancelled when admission rules required the candidate to be Inter in Sanskrit whereas the admitted candidate was not.[59] However an admission which slipped through in spite of inadequate percentage of marks was not allowed to be cancelled right on the verge of examinations.[60] Admission to the course of Physical Training Instructor after allowing the candidate to undergo full training for about a year was not allowed to be cancelled on the ground that the sports certificate given by him was not properly authenticated.[61] The principle of estoppel was also applied where a candidate was given admission in a particular subject by mistake without any suppression of fact by her and she persued the course and altered her position.[62] Where the selection committee admitted a candidate in a Medical College on a seat reserved for the army personnel by mistake, cancellation of her admission four months after joining was held to be illegal. More so when rules of natural justice were not followed[63] but the doctrine of equitable estoppel was not applied where the admission of the petitioner was cancelled only three days after his admission was wrongly made and he had not lost any chance to join any other institution.[64]

Where the petitioner got admission on the basis of the marks sheet supplied and when the university sought to cancel the result on the ground of mistake, it was held that promissory estoppel applies.[65] A wrong marks sheet showing that the student had passed was supplied to him by the university. He had no other means of knowing the real state of affairs relating to his examination results. It was held that the University was estopped from taking the plea after a lapse of a number of years that the student had in fact failed.[66]

Where provision in the prospectus of post graduate medical course regarding giving first preference to the in service candidates in selection of colleges or courses of studies was introduced by G.O. dated 17-3-97 after the petitioners belonging to the general merit quota wrote examination in accordance with the prospectus and it is not made clear that that part of the prospectus was made known to the applicants till the date of interview, the petitioners were not barred from challenging the prospectus as unconstitutional and incorrect.[67] However, the students, who were admitted on the basis of a certain prospectus and also appeared in the written examination, were held to be incompetent to challenge the said prospectus.[68] The fact that a candidate was allowed to appear for a competitive test for admission to a Medical College, does not estop the selection committee from refusing admission on the ground that the said candidate failed to prove his domicile.[69] Where in the admission notice of a Homeopathic Medical College as well as in its brochure it was given that the Central Council had given approval for upgrading the Diploma into Degree from that session and the petitioner-students acted on it and passed the diploma but no document was found to be issued by the authorities to this effect prior to the advertisement, it was held that the authorities would not be bound by mere declaration by the colleges in the absence of any rule postulating such conversion of diploma into degree course.[70]

There are four occasions categaried below, on which refusal to permit a candidate to appear in an examination do not attract estoppel (i) A person who practices fraud or makes a mis-statement or suppresses material facts cannot claim estoppel. (ii) Where there is some technical defect in the filling of the form or where there was a deficiency in attendance, which defect or deficiency could not be condoned by the authorities in exercise of discretion mentioned under the statute. (iii) Where the candidate was patently ineligible on the particulars supplied by him, as there can be no estoppel against statute. (iv) Where the question of eligibility depends upon the intepretation of a provision of law. The principle of estoppel will depend upon the facts of each case.[71]

Where a candidate was admitted to law course by a Law College, the University permitted to appear for pre-law, intermediate law and even final examinations but refused to declare his results on the ground that the candidate was not eligible to be admitted to the Law Course, it was held that the University was barred by estoppel.[72] Where the basis of selection for admission to an Educational Institution is changed abruptly to the detriment of the candidate, principle of estoppel applies.[73] Where in an admission test, an additional condition of passing two examinations for rural areas was imposed without earlier publication of the same, the State or University was estopped from denying admission on that basis.[74] Where the date of completion of house job by candidates was fixed mistakenly by the State Government beyond the cut-off date fixed by the Supreme Court for admission to post-graduate medical course, any candidate misled by the mistake of the State was entitled to seek admission on that basis for that year.[75] Where the Government gave recognition to an educational institution and later withdrew the recognition, the Government was directed to recognise the certificate issued to students joining the course before derecognition under the doctrine of promissory estoppel.[76] Where inaction by the University results in admission to a non-eligible candidate, equitable estoppel applies against the University.[77] The petitioner was promised by the Indian Institute of Technology (Madras) that his application for admission to the M. Tech., course would be considered if seats were available. One seat became vacant and the petitioner was the only earnest claimant for that seat. It was held that the Institute, on its own promise was estopped from denying the seat to the petitioner and it was not for the Institute to advance the cause of other candidates who had not evinced any interest in claiming the seat.[78]

Where for entrance examination to B.Ed. course, minimum eligibility criteria was fixed as 45% from 40% marks at degree examination of a recognised university by the National Council for Teacher Education Act, 1993 as advertised earlier but in the advertisement for the entrance examination it was shown that 40% marks will be minimum qualification, it would not act as estoppel against the university for changing the criteria of marks which was done in consonance with law.[79] Where the petitioner acted upon the eligibility criteria stated in the notifications and applied for the test on the basis of marks obtained by her in the Post-Graduate examination and on being declared successful she got admission in the B. Ed. Course, the respondents would be estopped from cancelling the admission of the petitioner on the ground of securing less than 45% marks in graduation.[80] Candidates were admitted to B.Ed., course, they had paid fees, pursued studies for months and had even submitted notes of lessons, etc. In the middle of the session, their admission was cancelled for non-compliance with one of the conditions laid down for admission. It was held, that cancellation at such stage, that too for no fault of the candidate attracted the doctrine of promissory estoppel and the order of cancellation was liable to be quashed.[81]

The fact that exemption was granted to a candidate in respect of minimum age at S.S.C. Examination, does not ensure to her the benefit for admission to all future courses of study, when she is overaged. However, acceptance of application for entrance examination to medical course, attracted the doctrine of promissory estoppel and she could not be denied admission.[82] A student was admitted to a private engineering college after due selection. His admission was subsequently cancelled on the ground that he had not secured minimum marks in qualifying examination as mentioned in college prospectus.

The University regulation did not prescribe any minimum marks for eligibility for admission to engineering colleges. The college was held estopped from cancelling the admission.[83]

Where the University Ordinance prescribed a rule for revaluation of answer books and a candidate, seeking revaluation of his answer booklet, found adverse change in his marks after revaluation, the outcome of revaluation is binding on him and there is no promissory estoppel.[84] On appearing in the improvement test a student was allowed by the university to appear at M. Sc. Pt. II Examination, her result could not be withheld on the basis of the resolution of the Examination Committee prohibiting the students from taking two examinations in a year. More so when the resolution was never communicated to her.[85]

Where the University represented to an examinee for M.Sc., (Part-I) examination that he had passed that examination by forwarding the mark list showing him to be successful and subsequently confirmed the said representation by informing him, in response to his application for scrutiny of certain answer books, that there was no change in the marks obtained by him, the University could not, after his having completed M.Sc. (Final) course as per requirement, prohibit him, on the eve of M.Sc. (Final) examination, from appearing at that examination on the plea that he in fact did not pass M.Sc. (previous) examination.[86]

A student was admitted to a medical college on transfer from another medical college. He was not informed that students admitted only through CPMT would be eligible to post-graduate course in a transferee college. It was held that denial of admission to the said student was not proper as the State Government had acquiesced in the transfer.[87] A Government resolution regarding admission to post-graduate courses in medicine were changed from time to time, even though the resolutions were amended prior to the date of admission to the post-graduate courses some of them were made, after the candidates passed the M.B.B.S. Examination. It was sought to be contended by the candidates that when they appeared for M.B.B.S. examination, they had in mind the Government resolutions which were in force for eligibility for admission to post-graduate course and they prepared and appeared for M.B.B.S. examination on that basis and their legitimate expectation regarding their eligibility for admission to post-graduate course on the basis of the results in the examination were shattered by a change in the rule regarding the admission in post-graduate course. It was held that the doctrine of legitimate expectations would not apply as a student appears for the M.B.B.S. examination would only look at the Government resolution operating at that time. In the circumstances it was held that the rule of promissory estoppel would not apply.[88]

An institution cannot change examination rules after the tests have already been conducted[89] and a candidate submitting to such rules cannot subsequently, assert rights contrary to them.[90]

Where the colleges were started on the basis of the permission granted subject to conditions mentioned in such permissions based on Govt. Order, and the managements started the colleges by investing huge amounts and putting lots of efforts on the basis of such permissions, the Govt. could not either make the 50% of the seats as Govt. seats in private unaided colleges or take away the right of admission of students to that extent by issuing executive order.[91] The University launched a programme of "autonomous colleges" on a year to year basis and issued application forms. A women's college filed application which was recommended by the Inspection Commission. There was no promise or assurance on the part of University. The College prescribed its own syllabus on autonomus pattern. Subsequently there was denial of status to college on the basis of direction of the University Grants Commission. It was held principle of promissory estoppel was not attracted.[1]

When sufficient number of S.C./S.T. candidates were not available to fill the reserved quota of seats in Medical or Dental Colleges, the Government reduced the minimum qualifying marks from 35% to 25% in order to accommodate more such candidates. It was held that the Government, was competent to do so and its action was not hit by rules of estoppel.[2] Non-consideration of a candidate as a reserved category candidate due to non-filing of such certificate could not be challenged after taking pre-entrance examination as a general candidate.[3] Where a student sought admission to an educational course by obtaining and filing a false certificate of belonging to a certain tribe, she cannot claim to continue her studies on the ground of equity or promissory estoppel as she did not come with clean hands.[4]

Where the candidates applied for admission to a particular course in terms of the prospectus, they were not estopped from challenging a particular clause of that prospectus later.[5] The candidates after having taken part in the entrance examination for admission to a super speciality medical course and having no right to reservation quota could not challenge the selection on the basis of subsequent retrospective amendment of the prospectus by the Govt. providing for certain reserved seats.[6] Where a student, prosecuting All India Secondary School Certificate Course, on transfer of his father to a place where no such course was available, applied for admission into a college affiliated to Council conducting Higher Secondary School Certificate Course and got admission, subsequently withholding his result in view of a Regulation of the Council that he had not passed any equivalent examination making him eligible for admission, was held to be illegal and the Regulation was held to be unreasonable and discriminatory.[7]

Where a student was admitted to LL.B. course though he secured less than 49% marks at the qualifying examination, on a recommendation of a Minister and subsequently admission was cancelled by the University, it was held that the cancellation was not illegal and the principle of estoppel cannot be applied.[8]

Where about the hike in fee the students were informed at the first available opportunity alongwith issue of their roll numbers for the entrance test, then in detail at the time of counselling and again by issuing a public notice, promissory estoppel would not apply against authorities from claiming the hiked fee.[9]

47. EMPLOYMENT—ESTOPPEL

Estoppel was pushed into service in favour of a person who was appointed the Vice Chancellor of a University for one term on the assurance that his appointment would be extended for one more term and he had on that basis given up his political career and his seat in the Assembly.[10]

Where the appointee accepted the terms and condition in the appointment letter and accepted monthly compensation, he could not subsequently contend that the appointment letter was not signed by an authorised person and hence its terms could not be complied with.[11]

Where the petitioner holding an unrecognised diploma in tailoring was appointed by the University as Tailoring Instructor after considering his qualification and was continued in service for four years and was kept under the impression that he would not be removed from service, it was held that the University was estopped from terminating his service as unqualified Instructor[12] but employment snatched by a workman on the basis of bogus and forged casual labourer service cards was liable to be recalled and voidable at the option of the employer. His continuing in employment for a number of years, would not attract estoppel.[13]

A candidate participating in the selection process is estopped from challenging the process. Omission in advertisement to state that it was a special recruitment was immaterial.[14] Where all the candidates were made aware of the procedure for promotion before they sat for the written test and before they appeared before the Departmental Promotion Committee, they could not turn around and challenge that procedure, when they found that they were not selected.[15] The conduct of appearing before a selection committee without any objection as to the constitution of the committee would create an estoppel preventing the candidate from challenging the Constitution of the committee even if the decision was against him.[16]

A person was allowed to appear for a competitive examination as being duly qualified. He was discharged from service after the expiry of the probationary period on the ground that he was not qualified to appear for the competitive examination, as the petitioner, was overage at the time of discharge and was not eligible for employment, it was held that plea of estoppel was available to him and the discharge was illegal.[17] Where there was negligence of the Government in re-appointing the petitioner and, on discovering its own negligence subsequently discharged the petitioner who had become overage at the time of discharge, it was held that the discharge was illegal and estoppel operated against the Government.[18]

It may generally not be useful or wise to take recourse to strict legalistic principles like estoppel in deciding questions in industrial adjudications.[19] Retrenched workmen in starving condition who accepted retrenchment benefits are not estopped from challenging the legality of the retrenchment as the technical plea of estoppel is not applicable in cases of industrial disputes.[20]

Though the claim of respondent to reappointment was overlooked while making appointments by the Manager of an Educational Agency and the Education Officer approved the action of the Manager, the respondent is not estopped from putting forward his right to reappointment in future proceedings in the absence of some positive action on his part which gives rise to the bar of estoppel[21] but employment snatched by a workman on the basis of bogus and forged casual labourer service cards was liable to be recalled and voidable at the option of the employer. His continuing in employment for a number of years, would not attract estoppel.[22]

The doctrine of promissory estoppel does not apply to a contract between the employer and the employees as to the range of quantum of Bonus. It cannot be said that, by the offer of bonus by the employer, the employees changed the position to their detriment as the offer is made in the context which the employees are presumed to know.[23]

An employee is entitled to seek change in his date of birth only in case of bona fide mistake in recording the date of birth at the time of employment, otherwise principle of estoppel will apply.[24]

48. EQUITABLE ESTOPPEL

A man may be estopped, not only from giving particular evidence, but from doing acts, or relying upon any particular argument or contention which the rules of equity and good conscience prevent his using as against his opponent.[25] The law of estoppel by representation is confined to the provisions of this section and apart from the provisions of this section there is nothing like what is called "equitable estoppel" evolved by the English Judges. The provisions of this section are in a sense a rule of evidence.[26]

The doctrine of equitable estoppel rests on the principle that where a party with full knowledge or with sufficient notice or means of knowledge of his rights and of all the material facts remains inactive or abstains from impeaching a transaction or freely does what amounts to a recognition thereof, or acts in a manner inconsistent with its repudiation so as to effect the situation of the parties so that the other party is induced to suppose that it is recognised. This amounts to acquiescence and the transaction although originally impeachable becomes unimpeachable. One cannot ordinarily be estopped to assert the direct violation of a statutory provision but equitable estoppel being a rule of justice should prevail over all other rules.[27] A representation made by one party for the purpose of influencing the conduct of the other party and acted upon by him, will, in general, be sufficient to entitle the latter to obtain the assistance of the court in equity for the purpose of realising the fruits of such representation.[28] A claim for compensation by a tenant against his landlord for improvement effected to the demised property may be rested on the doctrine of equitable estoppel though the law does not generally recognise any right in a lessee to improve the lease-hold estate and claim compensation from the lessor for the same after the expiration of the lease. But mere standing by and failure to object by the lessor when the tenant builds on the demised land is not sufficient to attract the doctrine. What is required is that there should be active encouragement by the landlord and an implied promise that in case the tenant was ejected he would be paid compensation. The doctrine of "equitable estoppel" familiarly known as a rule in Ramsden v. Dyson[29] is outside the provision of T.P. Act and its applicability is not excluded by Section 51 of the T.P. Act.[30]

When a person in bona fide belief that a certain property belongs to him, spends money upon it and the true owner stands by allowing him to spend money and make improvements upon the land, the true owner is estopped from asserting his title to the land as against the person making improvements in such bona fide belief.[31] Petitioner did not challenge merit list published for house jobs. Subsequently same merit list was published in respect of admission to M.D. Courses. The challenge by the petitioner to the subsequent list was held to be barred on equitable considerations.[32] A person tolerated an encroachment wall obstructing passage for nine years. He commenced proceedings but claimed removal only after four years of the proceedings. The Court would not allow him do so but ordered the defendant not to obstruct the passage further by dumping material.[33]

Surrender of Government of its legislative powers to be used for public good cannot operate as equitable estoppel against Government.[34]

49. DOCTRINE OF LEGITIMATE/REASONABLE EXPECTATION

"The doctrine of legitimate expectation has its genesis in the field of administrative law. The Government and its departments, in administering the affairs of the country, are expected to honour their statements of policy or intention and treat the citizens with full personal consideration without any iota of abuse of discretion. The policy statements cannot be disregarded unfairly or applied selectively. Unfairness in the form of unreasonableness is akin to violation of natural justice. It was in this context that the doctrine of legitimate expectation was evolved which has today become a source of substantive as well as procedural rights....."

"The doctrine of legitimate expectation can be invoked if the decision which is challenged in the Court has some person aggrieved either (a) by altering rights or obligations of that person which are enforceable by or against him in private law; (or) by depriving him of some benefit or advantage which either (i) he had in the past been permitted by the decision-maker to enjoy and which, he can legitimately expect to be permitted to continue to do until there has been communicated to him some rational grounds for withdrawing it on which he has been given an opportunity to comment; or (ii) he has received assurance from the decision-maker that it will not be withdrawn without giving him first an opportunity of advancing reasons for contending that it should be withdrawn. . . . . "

"The question whether the expectation and the claim is reasonable or legitimate, is a question of fact in each case. This question has to be determined not according to the claimant's perception but in larger public interest."[35]

The doctrine of legitimate expectation and the principle of promissory estoppel are invoked in the cases where one expects pecuniary or any other advantages of like nature. Where the petitioner was nominated as a member of syndicate of a university to render free services and the Vice-Chancellor suppressed the nomination, he could not invoke the doctrine of legitimate expectation or the principle of promissory estoppel.[36]

The concept of just expectation or promissory estoppel cannot be made applicable in strict sense to the academic courses particularly in the field of education wherein with the change and advancement, educational needs are fast changing.[37] Where no assurance was given by the corporation that allowance claimed by the respondents would be payable to them, the doctrine of legitimate expectation was not attracted.[38] Where both the parties had been acting upon the letter granting to telecast a certain fixed number of T.V. serial episodes, the letter served as an agreement between them and the applicant/party could not compel the authorities to grant extension on the basis of 'revised policy.' Neither the principle of legitimate expectation could be invoked nor that of the promissory estoppel.[39] Where in the admission notice of a Homeopathic Medical College as well as in its brochure it was given that the Central Council had given approval for upgrading the Diploma into Degree from that session and petitioner-students acted on it and passed the diploma but no document was found to be issued by the authorities to this effect prior to the advertisement, it was held that the authorities would not be bound by mere declaration by the colleges in the absence of any rule postulating such conversion of diploma into degree course. However, in view of the settled principles of "reasonable expectancy", the students were directed to be given promotion to 2nd year degree course after completion of 1750 hours of study and on passing the examination held thereafter.[40] Where the students admitted to an autonomous college persued the courses of study and passed the examination of Part I, II and III and the university conferred degrees on them, the university was estopped from pleading non-compliance with statutes by the college. It would also defeat the legitimate expectation of the students. The university could not refuse admission.[41] The question whether public interest will override legitimate expectation can be decided by the Govt. itself and the Court's duty is only to see that it is not irrational nor perverse.[42] However, withdrawal of a facility extended by way of concession due to arising of chaotic situation does not attract the doctrine of legitimate expectation or the principle of promissory estoppel.[43]

50. WAIVER

For attracting the principle of waiver there are two essential elements which should be satisfied. Firstly, waiver should be voluntary and intentional, and Secondly, there should be two parties one waiving and the other getting benefit from such waiver.

In an eviction proceeding against the tenant on default of payment of rent, withdrawal of amount of the monthly rent of default by the landlord subsequently amounts to waiver of the benefit of getting the tenant's defence struck off and the tenant would be entitled to get the benefit of waiver.[44] Where the appellant had not taken any benefit of the impugned order, the plea that the appeal was not maintainable on the ground of waiver and acquiescence, was not tenable.[45]

Where in persuance of the directions of the High Court, Sharma Committee was appointed by the Central Govt. to consider the submission of parties to the H.C. proceedings, the committee after hearing them assessed their needs in respect to leasing of mining area against which no objection was filed by the appellant party and the Govt. acted upon the recommendations of the committee, the appellant was estopped from challenging the assessment as he had waived his right by acquiescence.[46] Where a certain non-agricultural land was included in the Town Planning Scheme and the inclusion was not objected by the Government, after the reconstitution of plots, plots were allotted to the owner in lieu of that land and necessary entries were made in relevant records and the owner sold one plot to the petitioner whereat the Collector issued show cause notice to the owner raising dispute about not allotting land in lieu of Government land included in the scheme, issuing of notice was held to be illegal and barred by estoppel and by not objecting to the inclusion of the said land, the Government would be deemed to have waived its right.[47] Where the Govt. instead of initiating appropriate proceedings against an assignee of land, assigned with the condition that he would surrender the same when required by the Govt. without claiming compensation, on his selling the land in violation of the condition of the grant, initiated acquisition proceedings, the Govt. thereby waived to avail the condition of non-payment of compensation under the assignment deed and could not deny to pay compensation.[48] Where the plaintiff filed a suit for recovery against the carrier without giving prior notice under the Carriers Act, objection in respect of which was raised very belatedly, it was held that right to objection would be deemed to have been waived by the defendant.[49] Where a party participated in the proceedings of a Court for more than four years without any objection to its jurisdiction and authority, his participation amounts to waiver of the right of objection.[50] Where at the time of accession of J&K in India, the valuables left by the former Maharaja or his son in the treasury of J&K was not claimed by them as their private property for over 30 years, it was held that that was relinquishment of right or waiver voluntarily.[51] Where the objections of both the parties against the arbitration award were time-barred and a review petition before the lower Court, the only remedial course available was not utilised, the appellant was estopped from raising the plea that objections were time-barred in appeal before the High Court.[52] Where objection to the maintainability of a suit is neither pleaded nor such an issue is raised, the objection must be deemed to have been waived.[53] The party present on all dates of hearing including the date on which the auction sale was confirmed without any objection having been raised on his behalf, the doctrine of waiver would be attracted in his seeking the setting aside of the said auction sale.[54]

Where a tenant alleged the waiver of right of prior purchase under the J. & K. Right of Prior Purchase Act, 1983 on the ground that offer of sale was made to the tenant, the same was rejected as it was found that nobody had made offer to any of the heirs of the original tenant with the proposed sale price which was an essential pre-requisite under the Act.[55] Where the High Court had upheld the order of the District Inspector of Schools recognising the election of the Managing Committee and also directed the parties to make representation to the D.I.O.S. regarding some other points which both the parties did, it was held that by filing representation, right to appeal could not be said to have been waived.[56] Where the employees of an institute, which was not a 'local authority' but an autonomous body were appointed to perform election duties and they challenged its validity, they could not be said to have waived their right to challenge the validity of such an order simply because they had once performed the election duties. The principle of estoppel was also not attracted.[57]

In sale in execution of a mortgage decree the mandatory requirement of the provisions of Section 72-A(2) of C.P.C., the reserve price to be fixed could not be waived by the judgment-debtor. The said provisions are not solely for the benefit of the judgment debtor, they are also intended to remove a social evil.[58]

51. ESTOPPEL AND WAIVER

Estoppel and waiver are different. Estoppel is not a cause of action. It may, if established, assist a plaintiff in enforcing a cause of action by preventing a defendant from denying the eixstence of some fact essential to establish the cause of action; or, in other words by preventing a defendant from asserting the existence of some fact the existence of which would destroy the cause of action. Waiver, on the other hand, is contractual, and may constitute a cause of action. It is an agreement to release or not to assert a right. If an agent, with authority to make such an agreement on behalf of his principal, agrees to waive his principal's rights, then, subject to any other question such as consideration, the principal will be bound, but he will be bound by contract, not by estoppel. There is no such thing as estoppel by waiver.[59]

The generally accepted connotation of 'waiver' is that to constitute 'waiver' there must be an intentional relinquishment of a known right or the voluntary relinquishment or abondonment of a known existing legal right, or conduct such as warrants as inference of the relinquishment of a known right or privilege. Waiver differs from estoppel in the sense that it is contractual and is an agreement to release or not to assert a right; estoppel is a rule of evidence. Waiver may give rise to a cause of action whereas estoppel does not give rise to a cuase of action and it is only a rule of evidence.[60]

Waiver need not be founded on contract or agreement. Right of presumption can be waived.[61]

Abandonment is an aggravated form of waiver, acquiescence or laches and akin to estoppel. It cannot, be sustained as facts not sufficient to sustain waiver, etc.[62]

Where a candidate for selection knowing fully well the relevant facts about the members of the Selection Board voluntarily appeared for interview without raising any kind of objection against the Constitution of the Selection Board and took a chance of favourable recommendation in his favour, it was not open to him to turn around and question the Constitution of the Board when the decision was unfavourable to him.[63] Where the Electricity Board awarded a contract to a concern in which its consultant engineering company had financial interest, it was held that the petitioner who was one of the tenderers but who failed to object to the consideration of the tender made, the petitioner was estopped from questioning the award of the contract to the awardee.[64]

Where the Government constituted a Committee for selection of books for schools and colleges and the publisher submitted some books for selection and some books were selected it was held that the publisher was not precluded from raising an objection to the constitution of the Committee.[65] Mere request or expression of opinion cannot amount to waiver.[66] Where the services of a railway servant were terminated without any bar to his reinstatement, the servant could not be said to have waived his right to reinstatement by acquiescence, merely because he accepted in the same railway, after termination, a job inferior to the one he was holding prior to termination.[67] A decree holder who had obtained a charge for maintenance applied for execution but omitted to mention the charge in the execution petition. Subsequently she applied to enforce the charge in subsequent execution. Held, that the omission of the decree holder to disclose the charge in the first application could hardly be treated as waiver on her part for all time. At best, it was a waiver on her part in the first execution case.[68] Withdrawal of rent deposited by tenant under an order of court does not amount to waiver of the cause of action in a fresh suit for ejectment.[69] Mere waiver, acquiescence or laches not amounting to an abondonment of his right or to an estoppel against a person cannot disentitle that person from claiming relief in equity in respect of his executed, and not merely executory contract.[70] The plaintiff wrote to her bank manager that she had joined nunnery and, therefore, had no claim or interest in paternal property. This did not estop the plaintiff from claiming her share. The letter did not amount to surrender or waiver.[71]

A person cannot be held bound by any waiver, unless he is aware of what he is waiving and what rights he is abondoning.[72] Where there was allegation of bias against the member and objection was raised for first time before the High Court. It was held that waiver can be proved only if and after it is shown that the party knew about the relevant facts and was aware of his right to take the objection in questions and mere omission would not amount to waiver.[73]

52. MISTAKE

Where a person who has not been appointed an executor described himself as an executor under a mistake about his legal position, there is no estoppel.[74] No person can be estopped where the conduct constituting the estoppel is founded on a mistake of facts.[75] Any act done under misapprehension of legal right does not create estoppel, nor does the knowledge of the parties about their correct position.[76] Where a decree holder mistakenly treated preliminary decree as final decree, he is not estopped from moving for passing of final decree.[77] Application of a Government servant for retirement on completion of his fifty fifth year under a misconception of law, would not estop him from claiming his right under the rules, to retire at the proper age of retirement.[78] Admissions made in ignorance of legal rights do not operate as estoppel.[79]

53. WAIVER AND CONSTITUTION

Fundamental rights have not been put in the Constitution merely for the individual benefit, though ultimately they come into operation in considering the individual right, but they have been put there as a matter of public policy; the doctrine of waiver and the rule of estoppel does not apply to fundamental rights.[80]

There can be no estoppel against the Constitution. Its provisions are conceived in public interest and are intended to serve a public purpose. There can also be no waiver of fundamental rights. No individual can barter away the freedoms conferred upon him by the Constitution. A concession made by him in a proceeding whether under a mistake of law or otherwise, that any particular fundamental right, cannot create an estoppel against him in that or any subsequent proceeding. Such a concession, if enforced, would defeat the purpose of the Constitution. If the argument of estoppel is valid, an all powerful State could easily tempt an individual to forgo his precious personal freedoms on promise of transitory immediate benefits.

Merely because an undertaking was given before the High Court in writ proceedings on behalf of the pavement dwellers that they did not claim by fundamental right to put up huts on pavements or public roads and since they had given an undertaking to the High Court that they will not obstruct the demolition of the huts after certain date they could not be estopped from contending before the Supreme Court that the huts constructed by them on the pavements cannot be demolished because of their right to livelihood, which is comprehended within the fundamental right into life guaranteed by Article 21 of the Constitution.[81]

Article 14 protects us from both legislative and executive tyranny by way of discrimination. On the language of Article 14 it is a command issued by the Constitution to the State as a matter of public policy with a view to implement its object of ensuring equality of status and opportunity which every welfare State, such as India, is by her Constitution expected to do and no person can, by any act or conduct relieve the state of the solemn obligation imposed on it by the Constitution. Whatever breach of other fundamental right a person or a citizen may or may not waive, he cannot certainly give up or waive a breach of the fundamental right that is indirectly conferred on him by this Constitution mandate directed to the State. It is not for a citizen or any other person who benefits by reason of the provisions of Article 14 to waive any breach of the obligation on the part of the State.

S.K. DAS, J, however, observed that it is not quite correct to say that all the provisions of Part III of the Constitution grant fundamental rights. Where a right or privilege guaranteed by the Constitution rests in the individual and is primarily intended for his benefit and does not infringe on the right of others it can be waived provided such waiver is not forbidden by law and does not contravene public policy or public morals. In the instant case however there is no foundation on facts to sustain the plea of waiver.[82]

Constitutional right to equality extends also to a procedural matter.[83]

54. STATUTE OR LAW FOR THE BENEFIT OF THE INDIVIDUAL

There cannot be a waiver of limitation or estoppel against the plea of limitation.[84] Unless it was clear that the owners of the land (here tribals) knew about the provisions of the Land Acquisition Act or that the provisions were explained to them, waiver of right could not be presumed, more so when the compensation was accepted under oral protest.[85]

An ex parte decree was passed in wife's petition under Section 50 and 13 Hindu Marriage Act. That decree was set aside in appeal and the case was remanded. The husband contested the petition in the trial court on merits and also raised objection as to be territorial jurisdiction of the court. Such objection had not been raised in appeal against the ex parte decree. It was held that the husband had neither waived such objection nor submitted to the jurisdiction of the court.[86]

A party cannot confer jurisdiction on a court when it had none.[87] The Supreme Court by transferring the proceedings to itself under the Criminal Law Amendment Act could not acquire larger jurisdiction. The fact that the objection was not raised before the Supreme Court while giving directions cannot amount to any waiver.[88] Where one of the clauses in an agreement was that all disputes between them should be deemed to have arisen at a place D and only courts at D should have jurisdiction to determine the disputes. It was held that mere filing of certain suits at another place by a party will not operate as waiver so as to estop him from moving court at D.[89]

Under the Delhi Rent Control Act, the consent of the landlord for sub-letting the premises must be in writing and the same cannot be regarded as discretionary as it is in public interest, and the requirement cannot be waived.[90] Where a landlord who had taken land from the Improvement Trust on condition that it would be used for residential purposes only but he lets out the same for commercial purposes and both knew that the tenancy was not one permitted under the lease, the landlord is not estopped from claiming possession on account of himself being a party to the breach of the conditions.[91] It was held that the petitioner is not estopped from challenging the resolution of municipal council whereby the term of office was restricted, though he was a party to the resolution and from which he was benefitted.[92] Impossibility of compliance with the requirement as to notice under Section 80 of the C.P.C. cannot lead to inference of waiver of notice.[93]

A notice under Section 80 of C.P.C. is for the protection of the authority concerned, and if he does not require that notice in a particular case, he can waive his right to the notice.[94] Where during the tenancy (under the Rent Control Act) the Government who was the landlord in 1962 entered into an agreement by which tenant was to vacate premises for reconstruction and landlord to redeliver same after reconstruction. No question of policy, much less public policy, could arise. The landlord can waive the exemption benefit available for constructions made after 1-1-1951. The agreement is neither illegal nor unlawful nor defeating provisions of any law within the meaning of Section 23 of the Contract Act.[95]

Res judicata not expressly pleaded will be deemed to have been waived.[96]

Non-raising of objection to secondary evidence produced amounts to waiver.[1] Where two arbitrators did not appoint in umpire though it was one of the terms of reference, but the plaintiff waived that non-compliance by appearing before the tribunal; he could not later on object to the award being invalid on the ground that of non-compliance with cl. 2 of the First Schedule to Arbitration Act.[2] Where an assessee does not raise any objection as to the competency of the assessing authority to assess, such failure amounts to waiver of objection and it cannot be raised in the civil court challenging the authority of the Income Tax Officer.[3] When parties to a suit themselves agree to a procedure to be adopted before a local commissioner and do not raise any objection, thereto before him, it is not open to them to challenge the validity of that procedure afterwards either in the court of first instance or in a court of appeal.[4] In an application for execution of decree where notice was served on the judgment-debtor and there was no objection to jurisdiction by the judgement-debtor, the petition was dismissed for non-prosecution. A second executon petition was filed, it was held that the judgement-debtor is estopped from raising objection to jurisdiction of court in the second application.[5] Where a restoration application under Order IX, R. 13, C.P.C. was presented by the pleader's clerk, and no objection that the presentation was not proper, was raised, the objection must be needed to have been waived.[6] Where a court has jurisdiction to pass an order of attachment, but such jurisdiction is exercised in an illegal or irregular manner, the defect can be waived.[7] If A, a teacher, who stands dischraged on termination of vacancy waives the right under Rule 51-A, of Kerala Edcuation Rules to be reappointed to a subsequent vacancy with the result that B was appointed thereto, then A cannot be allowed to claim preference over B for reappointment, to a vacancy raising after the waiver of his right.[8] Where the stipulation in a contract is for the exclusive benefit of contracting party and does not create any liability against him, he can waive it unilaterally.[9]

In a case under the Madras General Sales Tax Act, the department did not raise any objection when affidavits were taken in evidence by the High Court. The objection must be taken to have been waived.[10]

A particular private right is matter of fact though depending upon rules of law. Waiver of such right operates as an estoppel under Section 115.[11]

In view of the provisions of a complicated statute of the type of the Kerala Land Reforms Act, and the recent nature of the amendments affected, so closely prior to the disposal by the execution court, the mere omission to urge before the execution court to make a reference to the Land Tribunal would not amount to a waiver of the right.[12]

Reliquishment of a future right of inheritance by a Muslim heir, for consideration, may debar him from setting up his right when it actually arises.[13] Formalities required by Section 240(3) of the Government of India Act, 1935 could be waived.[14] Where a person is aware of the illegality in election proceedings, but still participates in the election, he is precluded from challenging the validity of the election.[15] Where the petitioner pleads the aid of any section in an Act or an order, it is not open to him to challenge the validity of that section.[16]

Tra-Co. Buildings (Lease and Rent Control) Order, 1950, which was solely intended for the benefit of the class of persons claiming under it, does not contain any provision prohibiting such persons from contracting out of it.[17]

55. PLEADINGS AND PROOF

Whenever a waiver is pleaded, it should be shown by the party pleading the same that there was an agreement between them, that the person waving a particular right would not press that right in future in consideration of some compromise.[18]

Therefore, where a party to a litigation not only fails to invoke the doctrine of estoppel before the judge but joins issue with the opposite party upon the question and accordingly an issue is raised and evidence adduced on this question, such a party is precluded from relying on the doctrine of estoppel to prevent the other party from proving that question.[19] Where in a case involving land acquisition, the petitioner failed to take the plea of delay in taking possession vitiating the acquisition in the earlier petition which was unconditionally withdrawn when such a plea was available to him, he was estopped to take that plea in a subsequent petition.[20]

Where a plea of waiver is not taken in a written statement, the question of waiver need not be gone into by the trial court.[21] The plea of waiver could only be raised by a party who had accepted the representation of another and had acted to his detriment in relying upon it.[22] Plea of waiver cannot be raised for the first time in writ petition.[23] In order that, a legal remedy to which a party is entitled shall be deemed to have been waived or abondoned by it in express worded or by a deed there shall be clear indication by his conduct from which it can be inferred that there has been such a waiver or abondonment.[24] Waiver of a right cannot be lightly inferred and something more than inaction of the right holder in exercising the right is necessary.[25] Waiver may be express or implied. It may be intentional or due to inaction or gross-carelessness or absence of diligence on the part of the party having the right or advantage in his favour. The party having such right or previlege has a discretion to exercise the same.[26]

A person cannot be said to agree unless there is a free and voluntary consent. Mere promise in an attempt to avoid imminent threat to one's property does not amount to waiver.[27] The rule of estoppel or waiver cannot be applied against retrenched workmen who have no freedom to refuse payment in view of their financial position caused by the retrenchment.[28]

The defendant once having admitted the existence of certain fact in the written statement cannot be allowed to take the inconsistent plea which plea will irretrievably prejudice the plaintiff's case.[29]

Where in a suit for possession the appellant claimed title to the suit property under a will and set up the plea of adverse possessions it was held that both the pleas, being alternative, were permissible.[30]

56. COMPOSITE FEE

Where composite fee was levied from the operators of the tourist transport vehicles for promoting tourism and the operators were spending substantial money on expensive vehicles and undertaking work of transporting tourists, the authorities were estopped from levying anything beyond the composite fee.[31]

57. PAYMENT OF INSTALMENTS

A right created by contract, for example, in a consent decree may be waived. This waiver can be either express or implied. Where a party has two rights, the mere exercise of one right does not amount to waiver of the other but if there are alternative rights, the exercise of one right may imply that the party has waived to exercise of the other.[32] Life Insurance Corporation of India asserted that the policy lapsed since second instalment of premium was not paid. But it accepted 3rd, 4th and 5th instalments and also second with interest. It was held that by its conduct L.I.C., waived its right to claim the policy as lapsed; the nominee is entitled to the amount after the death of the assured.[33] Where an instalment decree was passed with a default clause, and there was a default by the judgement-debtor, the decree holder is not estopped from re-electing in favour of payment of instalment.[34]

58. WAIVER-NOTICE

Where a restoration application under Order IX, Rule 13, C.P.C. is presented by the pleader's clerk, and no objection that the presentation was not proper, was raised, the objection must be deemed to have been waived.[35]

Notice under Section 34, Income-tax Act, 1922 can be waived by an assessee.[36] Waiver of notice under Section 34, Income-tax Act (1922) by counsel does not bind the client.[37] Plea of want of notice under Section 106 can be waived.[38]

Where a tenant was given notice to quit and vacate on the last day of English calendar month (monthly tenancy) and an objection, that the notice was invalid on the ground that period of notice should have commenced from the day of month in which tenancy was created, was not taken by the tenant in his pleadings. It was held that the tenant was estopped from contending that notice did not coincide with the last day of calendar month of tenancy and notice was held to be valid.[39]

Notice under Section 49 of Punjab Municipal Act (1911) is mandatory. If the plea as to want of notice was not taken in the written statement, amendment can be allowed even at the stage of revisions.[40] Where the owner filed a complaint without issuing notice which was mandatory under Rule 15(2) framed under the Bombay Provincial Municipal Corporations Act, Section 457, the principle of waiver applied.[41] A notice terminating tenancy and demanding arrears of rent was issued under Bombay Rents, Hotel and Lodging House Rents Control Act (47 of 1947) (as applied to Gujarat). Subsequently a second notice fixing another date for termination of tenancy was given. Landlord, by giving second notice, waived the termination of contract brought about by the first notice.[42] Where the assessee filed returns and books of account and other evidence in support of the returns in response to notice issued under Sections 148 and 143(2) of Income-Tax Act 1961, he cannot challenge the notice as he is estopped by acquiescence.[43]

Acceptance of smaller sum without prejudice to balance of claim does not create estoppel.[44] Merely because a person had waived his remuneration for earlier periods, it does not follow from it that he waived his remuneration for period subsequent to such waiver.[45] Where the appellant's did not challenge the auction sale of their assets but claiming bigger amount though they accepted smaller amount given under the award, it was held that there is no estoppel against them on account of accepting lesser amount and there is no estoppel by auction.[46]

59. ESTOPPEL AGAINST STATUTE

The principle of estoppel cannot override the provisions of a statute.[47] The principle of estoppel cannot be invoked to defeat the plain provisions of a statute.[48] Doctrine of promissory estoppel cannot be invoked for the enforcement of a 'promise' made contrary to law.[49] Promissory estoppel cannot be invoked against a statute imposing ceiling on incentive retrospectively. [50] There is no estoppel against an Act of Legislature.[51]

Estoppel only applies to a contract inter partes and it is not competent to parties to a contract to estop themselves or any body else in the face of an Act.[52]

Where a statute imposes a duty by a positive action, estoppel cannot prevent it. Estoppel is only a rule of evidence which can be invoked under special circumstances but is not available to release a party from the obligation to obey a statute.[53] Where the document of family arrangement was required to be registered to be admissible in evidence, parties could not be estopped from questioning its validity though they were acting upon it and benefiting by it. There is no estoppel against statute.[54] Nor it can be used to prevent legislative and executive organs of the State from performing their functions. Estoppel is not available for preventing a Municipal Committee from acting according to law. A Municipality granted exemption from octroi for developing a Mandi, but subsequently revoked it. It again granted exemption in keeping with the terms of the original sale of plots, but again levied the tax. Even so a claim of estoppel against its legislative power was not allowed.[55] Where a person had acted on the terms and conditions of a code for several years even he was not estopped from challenging its validity.[56] Where an exemption from tax is granted to save an industry, the doctrine of estoppel is not attracted.[57]

There can be no estoppel against a statute. If the law requires that a certain tax be collected, it cannot be given up, and any assurance by the Government that it would not be collected would not bind the State Government, whenever it chooses to collect it.[58] Even if it is assumed that the petitioner had the necessary knowledge of the proposals for the imposition of water tax this does not take away his constitutional right of challenging the validity of the new taxation measure.[59] The principle of estoppel cannot be made available in case of imposition of a tax not authorised by law simply because there was some discussion between the Govt. and the timber mill owners/the victims of impost.[60] There can be no estoppel in the matter of a statutory levy. The conduct of the Government in accepting the tax for September, 1950, and for the subsequent periods does not estop them from demanding tax in respect of August, 1950.[61] If a party, in order to clear the goods from customs, has given the classification under a particular item of tariff head in accordance with the wishes of the authorities or even under misapprehension, and if the law allows him a right to ask for refund on proper apprisement and the party cannot be estopped from asking for refund.[62] Where a classification of a product as a residuery item was approved by the department for purpose of levy of excise duty, it would not estop the department from revising that classification according to law.[63] When statute imposes positive duty upon public officers in the general interest of public, exemption from duty cannot be claimed by pleading estoppel.[64] Neither the Government nor any subordinate department has a right to modify the provisions of a statute and to recover less on the basis of such modification to the detriment of public treasury, under the Customs Act. The department is not estopped from demanding statutory amount of Customs Duty.[65]

Where the petitioner had not studied Sanskrit in Intermediate and the condition precedent for admission to B.A.M.S. course was that the candidate must have passed intermediate with Sanskrit, it was held the management could not be estopped from denying admission to him as the prescribed condition is a legal requirement.[66] Where the students in polytechnic failed to put in minimum prescribed percentage of attendance but the Principal permitted them to take the examination, their examination having been cancelled the students could not plead the principle of promissory estoppel as permission to take examination was contrary to the provisions of the statute and even contrary to the provisions of equity.[67]

The Supreme Court held that the expression "wife" means legally wedded wife. In case of marriage of a woman with a man already having a living spouse, husband is not estopped from questioning it as a nullity and the second wife's right to maintenance as there is no estoppel in questioning the marriage.[68]

If the terms of a Government notification are clear, the interpretation put upon it by an officer of the rank of an Assistant Collector of customs would not be binding on the Government so as to estop them from claiming afterwards that interpretation was wrong.[69]

When the facts are fully set out and admitted, a party's opinion about the legal effect of those facts is of no consequence in construing the section. No estoppel arises by reason of the admission of the party as to such effect.[70] There can be no estoppel on a statement of law relating to the nomination of a person as a chela under the terms of a will.[71]

No person can be precluded from pleading that certain orders are illegal or invalid, because the question as to whether orders are illegal or invalid is a pure question of law and there can be no estoppel against law.[72] An undertaking was given before the High Cour in a writ proceeding on behalf of the hut and pavement dwellers that they would not claim any fundamental right to put up huts on pavements or public roads and that they would not obstruct the demolition of the huts after a certain date. They were not estopped from contending before the Supreme Court that their huts could not be demolished because of their right to livelihood comprehended in Article 21.[73] The provisions of Act 299 of the Constitution which are mandatory in character require that a contract made in exercise of the executive power of the State should satisfy three conditions laid down therein. Failure to comply with these conditions the contract would be void and unenforceable. There is no question of estoppel in a case where there is contravention of the provisions of Article 299(1) of the Constitution.[74] Though the plea of non-compliance with Article 299 of the Constitution is not raised earlier in the proceedings, a party is not estopped from raising it for the first time in revision under Section 115, C.P.C. There cannot be any estoppel against mandatory provisions of the Statute.[75]

The plaintiff and the defendant exchanged adjacent plots of land each worth more than a hundred rupees by means of an unregistered deed, both believing that they had effected a valid transfer. Possession was taken by each party and defendant began to erect a very costly building placing a wall thereof in the land he had acquired in exchange. While the building was in progress, the plaintiff demanded and obtained Rs. 525 from the defendant on the ground that the plot he parted with was found to be more in extent than the defendant's. After the completion of the building the plaintiff sued the defendant for recovery of his plot after removal of the defendant's building on it. The defendant pleaded that the plaintiff was estopped by his conduct from recovering the plot. It was held that the plaintiff was not estopped and that he was entitled to recover his plot owing to the absence of a registered deed of exchange as required by Sections 54 and 118 of the Transfer of Property Act.[76]

Even assuming that the executive by an order of Government had made a representation that an Act would not be brought into effect earlier than a certain date, that would not prevent the Legislature, when the legislation was actually introduced, from considering and making it a law and bringing it into effect from a date earlier than what was notified in the Government order.[77]

77. Madras Race Club v. State, AIR 1976 Mad 238.

Any interpretation by the State Government of a legislative enactment, even though it has resulted in a citizen changing his position to his detriment cannot operate as an estoppel.[78] Where the Central or State Government Amendment of the Land Acquisition Act provides uniform rate of interest at 4% in Land Acquisition cases, the terms of the Acquisition Manual do not operate as estoppel against Government.[79] Rules 28(1-A) and 57(2) of the Mineral Concession Rules (1949) being statutory rules, requirement of these rules cannot be waived by the State Government.[80] There is no basis for application of rule of estoppel to a matter arising under Section 5-A of Bihar Private Irrigation Works Act as amended in 1939.[81] Where a suit for rent is filed by one co-sharer alone without impleading others, defendant is not estopped from raising statutory bar under Section 246(1), Tenancy Act.[82] An occupancy right, once accrued, can be extinguished only in the manner provided in the C.P. Tenancy Act and not by mere rule of estoppel based on subsequent conduct.[83] Pursuant to a money decree based on a compromise, the land of a Santal was sold in execution. As the right of restoration is given by statute, it was held that the judgement-debtor was not barred by estoppel from applying for restoration of possession.[84]

If a statute having prescribed certain thing, itself provides for exemption therefrom under certain circumstances or authorises some body to exercise the power of exemption then any thing done not in terms of those conditions or qualifications will not be ultra vires and will be said to be merely irregular and to such an act, the doctrine that there is no estoppel against statute will have no application.[85] Where fair rent is fixed by the consent of parties, a second application for the same relief is barred previous order operates as estoppel, by conduct. Plea that estoppel could not lie against a statute would not apply in this case.[86] A tenant sublet accommodation with the oral permission of the landlord. As sub-letting is unlawful under Clause 12-A of C.P. and Berar letting of Houses and Rent Control Order, 1949, oral permission by the landlord cannot operate as estoppel or waiver of benefit of the prohibition. The Landlord is not estoppel from pleading that subletting is unlawful.[87] Where a minority educational institution accepted the terms and conditions contained in the code for many years, they are not estopped from challenging the validity of the provisions of the code as no estoppel arises against statute.[88] A statute barred benefit of a regulation to improve prior performance in examination. A candidate who had failed earlier at M.A. examination was granted an admit card. It does not estop the university from denying the benefit, as the statute envisages a total bar.[89] Non-publication of the application for a permit under the Motor Vehicle Act by the authority is in violation of a mandatory provision. If a petitioner concedes the claim of the respondent bona fide believing publication of his application, the concession made by the petitioner is not binding as there is no estoppel against the statute.[90] Suit by an agent against the owner on the basis of Section 8 of the Carriers Act (1865) is not maintainable even though no objection to maintainability is raised in the statement.[91]

In a case under Madras Hereditary Village Offices Act, 1895, it was held that the right recognised in Section 6(1) of that Act was a legal right and was enforceable and the same accrued to P's family in 1948 when division of the village took place and the order dated 31-1-1950 appointing D to the post of Karanam gave rise to the cause of action for the suit; Section 6(1) of the Act was held void by the S.C. in 1961; that since D at no stage had put forward any hereditory right in himself to be appointed to the post of the Karanam he was not estopped from contending that Section 6(1) was opposed to the Constitution of India.[92] In an eviction suit under the Bihar Buildings (Lease, Rent and Eviction) Control Act (1947), though objection under Section 11 of that Act was not raised, it can be raised in execution proceedings. There is no estoppel against statute.[1] If the position of the occupier and the payment of rent by him do not give him the status of a tenant, the Municipal Committee in accepting rent is not estopped under the Punjab Municipal Act.[2] Notice to quit was sent telegraphically by a landlord to his tenant. It was held that the tenant, was not estopped from contending that the notice was invalid, though he had replied, as there cannot be an estoppel against statute.[3] Where a tenant agrees, under consent decree, to surrender possession after one year and the landlord files execution after expiry of one year for recovery of possession, the tenant is not estopped from claiming benefit under clause 9(1) of Travancore-Cochin Buildings (Lease and Rent Control) Order 1950.[4]

Where a sale deed was followed by an agreement that the vendee or his heirs should not alienate the property, it was held that the bar of estoppel or waiver would not operate against the vendee as the agreement is in violation of Section 10 T.P. Act and Section 23 of the Contract Act.[5] A party is not estopped from challenging the sale contrary to the Partition Act after it had taken place for there cannot be any estoppel against a statute.[6]

Whether or not the appellant agreed or participated in the meeting which was held before introduction of the voting machines if such a process is not permissible or authorised by law he cannot be estopped from challenging the same.[7] Statement made under misapprehension of legal right does not create estoppel.[8]

A constructed a building as a residential one and let it out to the Government which located its office in it without any written permission from the Controller for converting the residential building into a non-residential one. Later the building was sold by A to B who filed a suit against the Government for eviction on the ground of bona fide requirement for his own residence. It was held that estoppel would not arise as the building continued to be a residential one by the absence of any written permission for conversion of the residential building into non-residential building by the controller as required by statute.[9] Where a public limited company doing forward contracts business, in a special meeting passed a resolutions depriving certain class of its shareholders of their right to vote and to declare and receive dividend etc., it was held that neither their absence at the meeting nor their failure to object at the subsequent elections held in accordance with the amended Articles of Association estopped them from raising the plea under Sections 397 and 298 Companies Act, the rights sought to be deprived being fundamental statutory rights conferred on them under the Companies Act which no shareholder could be permitted to barter away.[10]

Where the laws of money lending or monetary security are involved, the test is, whether the law that confronts estoppel can be seen to represent a social policy to which the court must give effect in the interest of the public generally or some section of it.[11]

An agreement regarding raising of objections to the validity of a will or otherwise, is no concession on a point of law and does not have the effect of estoppel against statute.[12]

60. TAX LAWS

Doctrine of estoppel does not apply to Income Tax Act, as equity is out of place in tax laws. Whether a particular income is to be taxed or not is a matter under the taxing statute. If it is not taxable under the statute, it cannot be taxed on the basis of estoppel or under any other equitable doctrine.[13] Income cannot be taxed on the basis of estoppel or any other equitable doctrine.[14] Income Tax Commissioner's power to object to settlement proceedings cannot be nullified by doctrine of estoppel.[15] There is no question of an assessee waiving any right accrued to him under the statute.[16] Written down value and depreciation determined under Section 35 of Income Tax Act, 1922 does not operate as estoppel or res judicata.[17]

Estoppel does not apply in case of successive assessments, as an assessment for each year is complete in itself[18] but in respect of assessment of land, land already assessed and certificate exempting it from future liability already issued, could not be reassessed for depositing one time tax.[19] Where a firm was dissolved and the individual partners were invited by the taxing authorities to pay their shares, and on payment of their shares they would not be required to pay anything further. The income tax officer was estopped from realizing the balance of tax from a partner who had paid his share.[20]

Where a party gave classification of goods in accordance with the wishes of the customs authorities or under some misapprehension, for clearance of his goods, he is not estopped from claiming for refund of tax paid on proper appraisal[21] and payment of tax voluntarily persuant to clause in terms and conditions of an auction, would not preclude the tax payer from claiming refund[22] but where the importer accepted the test reports indicating misdeclaration of the goods confiscated under Customs Act and agreed to adjudication by authorities after waiving the show cause notice against the confiscation of goods and imposition of penalty and the goods were released on that basis, they could not challenge the valuation on the basis of the test reports and the penalty and fine imposed.[23]

Issue of clarification or circulars by the Govt. regarding taxability of a certain item does not prevent the state from recovering the tax leviable according to law.[24] The principle of promissory estoppel does not apply in case of demand of additional tax.[25]

61. RENT CONTROL

When there is total lack of jurisdiction in the authorities under the Orissa House Rent Control Act, no amount of concession by party's counsel can confer any jurisdiction on them.[26] Fair rent fixed during compromise arrived at between parties before a Civil Court, would be outside the ambit of the Rent Control Act and it would not act as estoppel from getting the fair rent fixed under the Rent Control Act.[27]

62. ARBITRATION

Award of an arbitrator can be filed only in the court in which the suit would lie with regard to the subject-matter of reference. An agreement between parties to file in a different court is against the statute and cannot be given effect to.[28]

Appearance of a party in arbitration proceedings in terms of a contract which was void under some Act, could not later on be claimed by the opposite party as estoppel and prevent the party from repudiating the award as void.[29] The fact whether a clause in the agreement can be construed and considered as an arbitration clause, has to be decided by reference to the intention of the parties by reading the language of the clause and not on the basis of a petition filed by a party admitting the existence of such a clause. Filing of the writ petition will not operate as an estoppel.[30]

Plaintiff agreed to an arbitration under as agreement, clause 9 of which provided for reference to a sole arbitrator who is to be apponted by the Managing Director even if he be an employee. It was held that the plaintiff was estopped from raising the plea against the appointment of an employee.[31]
